Mr. STENNIS. I am not condemning those areas or States that had those conditions. I only want to point out that we are not supposed to be condemned and have a permanent condemnation placed upon us for conditions that were legal and valid and so declared by the Supreme Court, conditions that existed in other areas that now claim immunity from having had those laws.

Mr. ALLEN. It would be the opinion of the junior Senator from Alabama that we have served this penalty period, and if any penalty should ever have been attached to us—which the junior Senator from Alabama does not feel should be the case, but if we should be penalized—and the segregation of the schools in our areas classed as the evil type of segregation, whereas the segregation in the North is, shall I say, benign segregation, then I feel, if any such penalty is to be attached to us, we have gone through that period and our segregation should be typed as de facto, as well.

Many of our areas and many of our communities are completely changing their character. Areas in the cities and in rural places that have been integrated are changing to being all of one type or the other. When we go through this period of resegregation, as I pointed out to the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, we will be under this umbrella of de facto segregation and protected by that umbrella.

As the President pointed out, it has not been declared unconstitutional. So if we in the South get to the point where our segregation is de facto and is protected, as is de facto segregation in the North, then we are going to have to have, I suppose, the result of having school systems where there is practically no integration, because, as the Senator has pointed out in his speeches in the past, many of the schools in Chicago and Gary, Ind., are 99 percent of a minority race, which is far out of proportion to the ratio between whites and blacks in those States or areas.

So, if we follow subsection (b), which is sought to be grafted onto the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, to its logical conclusion, we are going to find that de facto segregation is legal, is protected and sheltered in the North, and if the segregation that applies in the South—and there is mighty little of it in the South at this time—changes, through desegregation and then resegregation, and then becomes de facto segregation, we would be out of reach of the law or the desegregation requirement, as well, and there would be no desegregation in the country, which I do not believe the advocates of subsection (b) understand or desire. But that is a very real and present danger.

Mr. STENNIS. I have said for some time that it looked to me like when this matter got close enough to the larger cities beyond the South, they would go looking for a way to change their rules; and I believe that is exactly what we are seeing done now. When we reach that point—and it will take some time for these changes to come about—and then resegregation sets in, which it will in some areas, I hope they do not change the rules again, then, and go back to putting us through another process. But I think by that time it will be realized that the people as a whole, black and white, do not want this enforced police power integration, enforced and sustained, when the costs—not money cost, but cost in emotions, cost in freedom, and other costs—are too great.

I want to direct the Senator's attention to another point. We are hearing in their argument—and it is made in good faith—that this segregation outside the South cannot be reached because it is not illegal, or at least has not been declared to be illegal by the Supreme Court of the United States. The Senator is a lawyer and has been keeping up with these cases. I think he knows that at least four times that question was presented to the Supreme Court of the United States from Courts of Appeals in districts outside the South, and each time the Court declined to hear the case on its merits and render a decision. Is that correct?

Mr. ALLEN. That is my understanding.

Mr. STENNIS. The real question, then, is: Is not this question before us now purely a congressional question, a legislative question? It does not interfere with the Court. It does not restrict the Court. It does not impede the Court in any way. It does not relate to the enforcement of any decrees of the Court.

The amendment the Senate adopted 5 weeks ago relates solely to money—Federal aid to schools.

Mr. ALLEN. That is right.

Mr. STENNIS. And the administration of that money by HEW.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. STENNIS. That is the whole story. This amendment just provides that HEW shall apply a uniform policy; that is, it is the policy of the Congress that HEW, in allotting this money over the Nation, will apply a uniform policy regarding segregation in the schools.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. STENNIS. That is the substance of it.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. STENNIS. It has nothing to do with a court case or what a court has said or not said. Is that right?

Mr. ALLEN. That is right. It is merely exercising our right under the Constitution to legislate.

Mr. STENNIS. And it is the sole power of the Congress to appropriate money.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. STENNIS. No other branch under our system can appropriate money.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. STENNIS. Of course, the President has a right to veto an appropriation bill, but he cannot originate it.

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct.

Mr. STENNIS. So after all, this is purely a congressional matter, for congressional decision, and the argument that the courts have not done this or have not done that is not even relevant, as I see it.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator from Mississippi for his questions, and for the light that his comments have shed upon the question now before the Senate.

Mr. President, all that the Stennis amendment seeks to do is to provide equal protection of the law for all citizens in this entire Nation, and it does that by setting up this uniform rule that the distinguished Senator from Mississippi has referred to. The proponents of the Stennis amendment come in asking for equal protection of the laws.

Equal protection of the laws; we hear that term used a great deal here on the floor of the Senate. And why should not this great problem, this great issue, be handled with one uniform policy, applying throughout the entire country? The Senate, by a vote of 56 to 36, endorsed that principle that we should have one uniform policy.

An amendment was sought to be added to the Stennis amendment by the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCOTT). It was in two parts, as I recall. The first part provided that the Federal policy with respect to segregation, or desegregation, would be uniformly applied in all areas of the Nation where segregation had been ruled to be unconstitutional. So section (b) is a mere rewrite of the first section of the Scott amendment to the Stennis amendment. That amendment was voted down by the Senate; and yet we see it come back in the conference report.

The Scott amendment, providing that desegregation policies would be applied uniformly in those areas of the country where segregation had been ruled unconstitutional, took into account, of course, that the only area where the Supreme Court has declared segregation in our public schools to be unconstitutional is the South; therefore, all the Scott amendment—or that phase of it; there is another phase to which I shall allude in a moment—said was that desegregation policies shall be applied uniformly in the South. Well, all that means is uniform desegregation everywhere in the South. It made no reference whatsoever to areas outside the South.

This section (b) goes on and sets up this other policy: "Such uniformity refers to one policy applied uniformly to de jure segregation wherever found, and such other policy"—which is different, or the words would not be "such other policy." If they had wanted to say "the same policy," they would have said "the same policy."

Such other policy as may be provided pursuant to law applied uniformly to de facto segregation wherever found.

So this is just a rewrite of the old Scott amendment—or the Scott old amendment, it might be better to say.

The second phase of the Scott amendment provided that there would be no busing for the purpose of overcoming racial imbalance. Well, that has been a part of nearly every HEW or Civil Rights Act that has been passed since 1964, and it did not mean a thing in the world as to de jure segregation, because it has been held to apply just to de facto segregation. So all that could have said was that there would be no busing in areas outside the South.

Well, that was hardly a change of any great degree. It just restated what has been enacted time and time again by the Congress. But the conference report calls on the Senate to approve and give its endorsement to provisions that are 180 degrees removed from the provisions of the Stennis amendment, because it provides two separate policies. The Senator from Mississippi, in proposing the Stennis amendment, took a statesmanlike view. He did not ask for special treatment in the areas of the South. He did not ask that desegregation stop in the South. He just said:

> Whatever policy you decide on, whatever is the Federal policy on this subject, apply it uniformly.

Mr. President, the question that is somewhat difficult for the junior Senator from Alabama to answer and to reconcile is why it is that the Senators who favor the conference report, the Senators who favor a dual policy, a policy calling for immediate desegregation in the South and protection of segregation in the North, if they say, as the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island said, that segregation is bad, as they do under section (b), why do they freeze segregation into the law? If segregation is bad, it is bad no matter whether it is in the North or the South. But yet section (b), which the conference committee added—which completely emasculates the Stennis amendment; there is no doubt about that, and every Senator knows it—fosters, protects, encourages, and freezes into the law segregation in the North.

I have some interesting figures on that, which I used in the debate on the Stennis amendment. According to the figures of HEW, 91.7 percent of the Negroes in Alabama attend schools that are majority black. These same figures show that in the city of Los Angeles, 95.3 percent of Negroes attend majority black schools.

In Newark, N.J., 97.9 percent of the Negroes attend schools that are majority black.

In Gary, Ind., 96.9 percent of Negroes attend majority black schools.

So they take the position that they do not want to proceed against de facto segregation—leave that alone; that is all right; that is fine—and let us go out and get this de jure segregation. There is more segregation in many areas outside the South than there is in many sections of the South. I cannot understand why the Senators who favor protecting de facto segregation are so anxious to attack and desegregate de jure segregation in the South. If desegregation is good for the South, it ought to be good for the North.

It would occur to the junior Senator from Alabama that the black constituency of such Senators as the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCOTT) might wonder why the distinguished Senator is willing to see segregation frozen into Philadelphia and other big cities of Pennsylvania. How is he able to convince them that segregation is good up North and is bad down South?

That is what subsection (b) would suggest that we do. Let us treat them differently. Let us have one rule pointing southward and another rule pointing northward. Yes, let us foster and encourage, by inaction, segregation in the North.

Mr. President, I am proud of the attitude of the people in the South in complying with the mandates of the courts. I am proud of the good faith efforts that the people of Alabama and the South have given to complying with the desegregation mandates of the courts, while at the same time all they have to do is to look northward, and not one single thing is being done up North to rid the northern areas of the evils of segregation in the public school systems up North. Our people would like to see a uniform policy. If you are going to have massive efforts to desegregate, fine. We have been living with that down South for quite some time. If you are going to have that, though, let us have it up North, too. If you are going to tolerate or foster or encourage segregation up North, the same rule ought to apply down South.

We are a State, one of the 50 States, and are proud to be a State. We observed our 150th anniversary as a State back in December. We are proud of our statehood. We are proud of our Constitution. We want to see it applied equally. We want to see equal rights under the law.

We have heard much in recent years, all through the years, "Well, you fellows down South, get right with us in other areas. You-all come along and conform." We have conformed. Now we want to see the other areas of the country conform to the same standard that has been set for us. Do not just say, "Segregation is bad down South; we want to get rid of it; but it is good for the North. We are going to protect it." It will take the whole Army, as one Senator said, to enforce the Stennis amendment if an all-out effort is made to put into effect in the North what the people of the South have been putting up with.

Mr. President, I would like to point out again what the junior Senator from Alabama suggested to the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island about the dangers, from his point of view, inherent in section (b). That has to do with de facto segregation—northern style segregation, shall we say—being protected in areas outside the South, and the statement of the President says: No Federal action against de facto segregation. But we are going to protect and foster de facto segregation that exists in many cases to such an extent that there are many, many, many all-black schools in the big cities of the country. We are going to protect that segregation. We are going to permit that. No move will be made against it. But we are going to desegregate down South.

So there are two rules: to desegregate in the South; to continue segregating in the North.

I have an interesting fact that I should like to read. I do not have any prepared remarks. I hope that Senators will forgive me if I ramble somewhat. I do have a number of copies of some of the speeches I made during the debate on the Stennis amendment. When I reach the point where I shall stop talking off the cuff, I shall probably have several hours of discussion here. But I would rather talk about these thoughts as they come to me.

Segregation is vanishing in the South. It is vanishing because our people are making good-faith efforts to end segregation.

What is the case up North? What is the case in the State of New York? Someone sent me an editorial broadcast by a New York radio station which referred to booklets published by the regents of the University of the State of New York. The first one is dated January 1968; the other is dated December 1969, pretty well up to date.

One paragraph in the booklet published in 1968 is headed "Problem Growth." It reads, in part, as follows:

> Despite the determined, significant accomplishments of many in education, the growth of the problem has outstripped the efforts to deal with it. Racial imbalance within school districts is increasing in both suburban and urban communities.

That, Mr. President, in the face of hundreds and hundreds of school districts in the South that have been desegregating all the time. I believe I noticed figures in the President's message saying that in the last year the number of desegregated districts had increased from 600 to 1,200. The number more than doubled last year. That doubling was practically all done in the South. I continue to read:

> Racial census reports show that between 1961 and 1966 in the 41 school districts with the highest percentage of Negro pupils, exclusive of New York City—

I would hazard the guess that it was probably a higher percentage in New York City than out in the State—> the number of elemenetary schools with more than 50 percent Negroes increased from 60 to 72. The number with more than 90 percent Negro pupils increased from 25 to 33.

Racial isolation among school districts is also increasing. In this same period the percentage of Negro pupils in one suburban district rose to 82 and in another to 71. In three districts, the percentage surpassed 50. Then in December 1969, there was a review of the revised studies of the one taken some 2 years before, a restatement of policy in which it was stated that the efforts of the State of New York to eliminate segregation and speed integration must be increased. Racial social class isolation in the public schools has increased substantially during the past 2 years despite efforts to eliminate it.

Thus, Mr. President, that is what we say in the South, that the school districts desegregated there have doubled in the last year; whereas in the State of New York, segregation has increased dramatically. But the subsection (b) protects, shelters, puts an umbrella over this type of de facto segregation. We are not going to proceed against it.

So going on with my hypothetical case, showing the dangers inherent in section (b) and pointing out that the Federal policy as it exists now and as it would be frozen into the law under the conference committee report is one of protecting and favoring de facto segregation as it exists outside the South. But the same Federal policy—the two-pronged Federal policy—calls for immediate desegregation of the public schools in the South.

Now, Mr. President, is that equal protection of the laws? Is it fair? Is it equal? Does it protect at all the public schools of the South?

The Negro citizens of the South, a substantial number, if not a full majority of them, prefer their own neighborhood schools. I am happy that the President in his message spoke of using the neighborhood school as the base in matters having to do with the public schools of the country.

That is another reason we feel that the conference committee should consider its report in light of the President's suggestion. I feel that, if the Chief Executive of the Nation makes some suggestions, made after the conference committee made its report, there should be little opposition to sending that report back, so that the report can be considered in the light of the President's message.

The black citizens of Alabama and the South support the neighborhood schools. They are proud of them. I have had numerous complaints registered with me on the demand by the Department of HEW that the black schools be closed. They have school pride, a fine building, a fine band, a cafeteria which is used for community meetings. They have a good school spirit with some of the best bands in the country and fine football teams.

They do not want their schools closed. But we have had $100 million worth of schools ordered closed in Alabama.

Now, Mr. President, if the public schools of the South become completely desegregated to the full satisfaction and approval by HEW and of the Supreme Court mandate and then the process of changing residence patterns begins to take place—as it took place in the great city of Washington where I understand the schools are about 95 percent black—if the process of resegregation takes place and the schools become completely segregated again, that would not be because of the dual system that the South had prior to 1954, and which were legal up to then.

That could not be laid at the door of the laws providing for a dual system of segregation, then, and resegregation would have to be considered de facto segregation.

Mr. President, if we have a complete desegregation of public schools in Alabama and the South, so complete that it meets the approval of HEW and meets the approval of the Federal court and meets the approval of the Supreme Court, and then if, over a space of months or years those systems by a change in residence patterns because of a flight to the suburbs, as has taken place in Washington, those systems become segregated again, if they become resegregated, then since they did not result from any State law providing for a dual system, they would come under the de facto segregation protected by subsection (b).

So, then we would have nothing in the entire country but de facto segregation. The Supreme Court still has not ruled on it. The President said they are not going to proceed against de facto segregation. Then we would have de facto segregation in the North and de facto segregation in the South. Would everyone be happy then?

That, I give warning, is the logical and reasonable expectation and conclusion to be reached as the probable consequence of the passage of section (b) recognizing the two systems.

Mr. President, the decision of the Supreme Court in 1954, in Brown against Board of Education, held that any segregated school was unequal. They were unequal schools and the States had to stop maintaining a segregated school system. It did not say anything about forced integration.

The Supreme Court has changed 180 degrees also. They first started out saying that the State could not force segregation in its public schools. They have now changed that to where they say the State has got to force integration. That is a change of 180 degrees, exactly the change that has taken place here in the conference committee report as compared with the action of the Senate.

It would occur to the junior Senator from Alabama, following the reasoning of the Warren court that segregation is unlawful and that a segregated school is unequal, how then can the proponents of the conference committee report, the proponents of the dual system of Federal policy, say they are affording equal protection of the laws to the boys and girls of their States who are required to go to a segregated school in the North?

That is the worst sort of legal reasoning to say that just because the South at one time had separate school systems, their type of segregation is unlawful, but the segregation in the North that came about by reason of residence patterns is not.

We are going to find down South some de facto segregation. We are going to find resegregation of our schools.

I would much prefer to see a uniform policy apply throughout the country than to have two different systems.

The President has spoken of bringing us together. We can be brought together better, it seems to me, by a uniform plan providing equal treatment for everyone.

How are we going to bring people together when we have two different ways of treating people? It hardly seems fair to the junior Senator from Alabama.

I believe that the proponents of this measure are going to go home and discover what the people really want. I am glad this thing is being carried over until after the Easter recess. I believe that when the proponents of this measure go home, their people who want to see the public schools of the South desegregated will, when they find out what is going on in the Senate, suggest to some of their Senators, "If you are going to be for desegregating those southern schools, why can you not be for desegregating these northern schools as the Stennis amendment would do?"

I believe they will find that the people back home want to see a uniform application of the law. And I do hope that the distinguished Senators who do advocate the conference committee report will analyze their position and see if it does not present a danger to the whole country in a matter of years, ending up with de facto segregation which they seek to protect.

They say, "Do not interfere with it. The Stennis amendment might interfere with our segregation up North. We want to keep that. Let us confine our efforts to our whipping boys down South. Let us keep on beating on them. Leave our conditions up here just as they are. Sweep them under the rug. Do not mention them. Keep on protecting them because it might take a whole army to enforce that type policy up North." That was stated by one of the distinguished Senators in the debate on the Stennis amendment.

Mr. President, I do not have any desire to monopolize the floor for the rest of the afternoon. I saw the distinguished majority leader come into the Chamber. It may be that some sort of an agreement can be reached with respect to voting on the conference committee report or some preliminary maneuver, but working on to the conclusion of the report, provided agreement is reached with respect to taking final action to vote on its merits on the nomination of Judge Carswell.

I say, as a matter of equity and fairness, that it is only right that these matters be handled together because the nomination of Judge Carswell to be an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court was under consideration in the Senate as the pending question when the distinguished majority leader, whom I admire and respect, and who has a right to control the flow of business and the flow of legislation up to a point, put in the conference committee report and made it the pending business.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I am delighted to yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I do not wish to reflect at all on anyone, but I think this statement should be in the record. I think it illustrates a problem that is common to all of us; that is, that those who live in glass houses should not throw bricks.

There have been a lot of calls here about the fact that Judge Carswell had a share of stock in a country club or some such thing.

I see that one of our colleagues, who has opposed Judge Carswell and has taken the position that Judge Carsweli is a racist, was once in an all-white fraternity which barred people of other races from participating.

I regret that the Senator from Indiana is not here at the moment, but he can comment on this when he hears about it.

I have before me an article whose headline reads: "BAYH Once in All White Group." The article states that as late as 1961 this fraternity at Purdue University limited membership to white Christian males. Not only were Negroes not permitted to join, but, according to the article—

> In 1961 the national fraternity withdrew its charter of the Stanford University Chapter when the local organization accepted 4 Jewish students as members.

Mr. President, the article refers to 1961. There has been reference to the present nominee being a member of a country club in 1956, which much predated the 1961 action of the Purdue fraternity group.

I think it might be appropriate to place this article in the RECORD. If the Senator wishes to object to it, it would be all right with me to strike it out. It is a matter of public record, and the article speaks for itself.

Does the Senator have any objection if I put it in the RECORD?

Mr. ALLEN. I believe I will object at this time. I am somewhat shocked and grieved and saddened by this disclosure. I do not believe this is the time to place it in the RECORD.

Mr. LONG. I will leave the article on my desk. If the Senator from Indiana wants to comment on it, he may. I will just leave it here.

If I might further impose on the time of the Senator, for some time I have wanted to make a speech about a change of rules in the Senate. Now that the germaneness period has expired, I would very much hope I might be able to make my speech, because I have four amendments that I think would be helpful to improve the efficiency and expedite the proceedings of the Senate.

May I ask whether the Senator will yield to me during the next 15 or 30 minutes so that I may obtain recognition? I have a double-spaced speech which is about 16 pages in length.

Mr. ALLEN. I was just concluding my remarks and would then have suggested the absence of a quorum. Then the Senator from Louisiana could seek recognition, because I intend to yield the floor. I was just summing up the situation with regard to the unanimous-consent proposal.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator would be so kind, I could make my speech during the time that would be taken for the quorum call. I would be happy to suggest the absence of a quorum. The Senator from New York also wants to be recognized for a few minutes.

Mr. ALLEN. Would the Senator allow me 2 minutes to conclude my remarks?

Mr. LONG. Yes. I appreciate very much the Senator's very kind courtesy.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I was speaking with respect to the unanimous consent proposal, and I was pointing out that the Carswell nomination was under consideration in the Senate when the conference report supplanted it as the pending business.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield.

Mr. PELL. I think the RECORD should show that under the rules of the Senate the conference report was privileged and that there was no choice in the matter.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad the Senator mentioned that, because the junior Senator from Alabama was not going to mention it. The Senator from Rhode Island is I believe, in error in feeling that the report was privileged, because we were in executive session at the time, and the report, being a legislative matter, it would have no privilege; it would have taken the vote of the Senate to change over to the other business.

Mr. PELL. I stand corrected. Undoubtedly the Senator has studied the rule. I thought it was a privileged matter.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad the Senator asked the question.

Mr. President, the junior Senator from Alabama is ready and willing to vote on the conference report and on the nomination of Judge Carswell, and at any time the two are linked together and a time certain set for final votes on both matters, with preliminary motions leading up to that final vote to be in order; but the time for final votes being set, the junior Senator from Alabama is ready and willing and anxious to vote.

I yield the floor.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement by the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER) concerning the Stennis amendment to the education bill.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR TOWER

I commend our conferees on the presentation that they made concerning the Senate version of the Education Amendment bill. From what I understand, they presented our position forthrightly and with competence. However, I am concerned about the failure to retain intact the Stennis Amendment which would require equal enforcement of the HEW guidelines in all areas of the nation.

The debate on the Stennis Amendment was one of the most enlightening that we have had here in some time. Senators from every part of the Nation, representing every shade of political philosophy, united to stand for the proposition that everywhere the law which spread over a two-day period on this shall be applied equally. Both the debate, issue alone, and the vote, which was an overwhelming 56–36 in favor of the amendment, strongly demonstrated that this amendment should have been preserved. I do not fault the conferees for not being able at this time to fulfill this command of the Senate, for I understand fully the realities of the situation. However, the Senate spoke very decisively on this issue; I support the effort to send the bill back to Conference with binding instructions that the Stennis Amendment must be kept in the bill in the language originally approved by the Senate.

Again, I have rarely seen the Senate speak so clearly on any issue. After the length of debate that we had here, there was not a shadow of doubt in the mind of any Senator as to what the Amendment meant and what the feeling of the Senate was. In all good conscience, we must now send the measure back to conference to make certain that this most important issue is maintained. I have not the slightest doubt that if the matter were submitted to the House directly for a vote, that the Senate position would be upheld. Let us now proceed to ask the House to act affirmatively on this matter.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Hackney, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 4148) to amend the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, as amended, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the following concurrent resolutions:

S. Con. Res. 47. Concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of the report of the proceedings of the forthy-fourth biennial meeting of the Convention of American Instructors of the Deaf as a Senate document;

S. Con. Res. 50. Concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of additional copies of the 1969 report of the Senate Special Subcommittee on Indian Education (S. Rept. 91–501);

S. Con. Res. 52. Concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of a compilation of the hearings, reports, and committee prints of the Senate Subcommittee on National Security and International Operations entitled "Planning-Programing-Budgeting";

S. Con. Res. 53. Concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of the National Estuarine Pollution Study as a Senate document; and

S. Con. Res. 55. Concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of additional copies of Senate Report 91–617, entitled "Organized Crime Control Act of 1969."

The message further announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 559) directing the Clerk of the House with regard to enrolling the title of the bill, H.R. 4148, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SENATE RESOLUTION 377 THROUGH SENATE RESOLUTION 380—SUBMISSION OF PROPOSED CHANGES IN SENATE RULES

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, from the point of view of anyone who has ever worked in a State legislature, the U.S. Senate is inexcusably inefficient.

True, much can be said about the thoroughness with which our committees develop the facts. Much can be said in favor of the freedom of debate which exists here on the Senate floor. Nevertheless, there is not the slightest doubt in mind that this Senate could meet half as many days and do every bit as good a job as it does.

I am one of those who have advocated free debate in this body. I have resisted efforts to change the rules to make it easier to shut off debate. In some respects, the right to filibuster accounts for about 1 month out of the average Congress. I am one of those who has argued that this is not too high a price to pay to preserve the freedom of debate that we enjoy here.

Beyond the right to filibuster, there are a great number of matters which make the Senate inefficient that cannot be justified by any logic under the sun.

I am submitting some proposed changes of the rules to help to do something about some of the needless inefficiencies and waste of time in this body. If the Senate will act favorably upon as many as one-third of my suggestions, then I will offer at least as many more as I am offering now.

The first inexcusable waste of time in this body is the fact that a committee can be prevented from meeting while the Senate is in session although a majority of Senators are perfectly content that the committee meet. During much of a Congress, particularly during the early months of a first session, there is little to be done on the Senate floor because the major bills are being considered in the committees which are holding hearings and executive sessions. Yet, during this period, any Member who wishes to impede the progress of a bill which he opposes may leave a standing objection with the leadership on his side of the aisle and any motion that the committee be permitted to meet during the session of the Senate will be objected to by the leadership on his side of the aisle. True, a committee can be permitted to meet by a majority vote of the Senate, but the motion is debatable.

The Senator seeking to delay consideration of the bill need only suggest the absence of a quorum, thereby delaying the Senate for perhaps 20 minutes while the leadership prevails upon 51 men to enter the Chamber. Thereafter, the Senator seeking to delay legislation can discuss the matter for a while, then he can suggest the absence of a quorum again. By this time, the men who had entered the Chamber will have disappeared and it will take another 20 minutes to muster another quorum.

With the greatest of ease, a Senator can continue to discuss his reasons for objecting to the meeting of the committee with the result that the motion never comes to a vote and the committee is without the right to meet. The ridiculousness of this situation is farcical. So long as a quorum is present in the Senate or, for that matter, until it has been determined that no quorum is present, it is beyond the power of anyone to compel the presence of any Senator in the Chamber. He can go anywhere he wants to go or do anything his heart desires, provided it does not violate the general laws affecting all situations, and no one can stop him. He can visit with friends; he can attend meetings downtown; he can stay at home; sleep all day; spend his time on the golf links; go to the picture show; visit the United Nations—or the burlesque for that matter—go to the ball game; exercise in the gym; attend a meeting of the Students for a Democratic Society or a convention of the Daughters of the American Revolution. He can do anything under the sun except attend a meeting to advance the consideration of legislation—which is one of his prime duties.

He can do anything that is his duty or anything that is not his duty. He need not even be in Washington or anywhere near Washington. But he is forbidden to attend the meeting of a committee to consider or to advance a piece of legislation even though the Senate may have instructed his committee to report this measure and may have placed a time limit on them.

If the committee should insist on meeting without consent of the Senate then the person who opposes the meeting has a right to insist that the Government not pay any of the clerical or stenographic expenses of the committee session. And, indeed, the stage has been set for dilatory action to prevent the measure from being considered because the committee met in violation of the rules of the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. President, I am submitting a proposal (S. Res. 377) that committees of the Senate be permitted to meet unless they have been forbidden to meet by a majority vote of the Senate.

My proposal provides that a motion that committees be denied the right to meet shall be decided without debate. The importance of requiring that the motion that a committee should not be permitted to meet be put in this fashion is that the party seeking to delay matters by suggesting the absence of a quorum would have it beyond his power to prevent a committee from meeting during this period of time that 51 Senators were on their way to the Senate floor. The measure which I am proposing would not confront any effective leadership or any effective majority leader with a problem. Whenever he wished to require the presence of all Senators, he should have little difficulty in persuading a majority of Senators to vote that a committee could not meet.

In the event that a majority of Senators preferred to permit a committee to meet, there is no reason why the committee should not be permitted to meet even if it should incur the displeasure of a majority leader.

Those who are unfamiliar with the proceedings of the U.S. Senate should be aware of the fact that during most of the time that the Senate is in session there are no more than 15 Senators on the Senate floor. The number of Senators required to order a rollcall vote of the yeas and nays varies from 11 to 20, depending upon the number of Senators who were present at the previous quorum call or at the previous rollcall.

A considerable amount of delay in the Senate can be justified only on the theory that the public is unaware of the fact that the average Senator spends very little of his time on the Senate floor and that the public must be misled to think it is otherwise. Those who work for the Senate know that Senators do most of their work in their offices, committee rooms, and the various meeting rooms around the Capitol. In most cases, the average Senator hears very little of the debate that transpires. After a Senator has been in this body for 2 years, he has heard most of the issues discussed and he knows how he would like to vote on most of them. When he has served a full term, he has usually heard most of the issues discussed two or three times. He has voted upon most of the issues that he will be called upon to vote on at least once and, sometimes, two or three times.

Senators just do not waste much time listening to arguments they have heard before, particularly if it is an argument with which they do not agree. It is to maintain a false image that there are 51 or even 99 Senators present, hanging on every word the speaker is saying, that we do some things which waste a great deal of time. If we could keep a log to show how many Senators were present, in fact, it would save a great deal of the Senators' time.

But I am not seeking to do this because it would embarrass me, if not all of us. I only seek to bring about enough efficiency in the Senate so that it can do 6 months' work in 8 months, rather than in 12.

My second proposed change of the rules—Senate Resolution 378—would provide that once a quorum has been determined to be present, it would not be necessary to call the roll when the Presiding Officer can look across the Chamber and count 50 other Senators present. A procedure of this type is part of the Rules of the House of Representatives. Many times during the course of a Congress, a Senator will suggest the absence of a quorum merely to be dilatory. Many times I have witnessed a case where as many as 90 Senators would be present and a Senator would suggest the absence of a quorum, particularly for the purpose of delay. When the word was passed that he was intending to be dilatory, Senators would begin to depart from the Chamber and, by the time the Clerk had completed the call of the roll, there would be no more than a dozen Senators in the Chamber. By the time the Senator had been talking for 20 minutes there would be less than four Senators in the Chamber. I would not deny the right of a Senator to delay the Senate by engaging in debate. Many times, however, the Senator who is delaying the measure has so little knowledge of the subject that he is not even in a position to discuss it intelligently.

If one would delay the Senate when the overwhelming majority of the Senate are present, he should at least have to go the trouble of talking and speaking to the subject itself. He should not be permitted to impede Senate action by suggestion that a quorum is not present when anyone, at a glance, can tell that a quorum is clearly present in the Chamber.

If Senators are going to engage in a filibuster they should at least have to stand and speak. They should not be permitted to filibuster from their seats.

This second change of the rules which I am proposing has an additional advantage when the Senate is anxious to vote. If a Senator proposes an amendment particularly for the purpose of being dilatory, it is within the power of the Presiding Officer to recognize the majority leader, or some other Senator who is anxious to get on with the business, and that Senator may move to lay the amendment on the table. Under a rule in Jefferson's Manual, a Senator is entitled to make only two speeches on a given subject during a legislative day. If the Senate will keep a quorum present, then the Senator seeking to delay matters can be denied the right to speak on amendments with the result that he must direct his debate to the bill itself. In this fashion, a single Senator would be incapable of delaying the Senate more than 36 hours if the Senate were so determined that it was willing to continue its sessions around the clock. Even if two Senators were determined to prevent the Senate from voting they could hardly impede the Senate more than 4 days without the help of others. This is about as long as two Senators should be permitted to delay the others.

The proposed change which I am suggesting here would help to avoid other needless delay.

Under the rules, a rollcall vote may be had and the vote of each Senator recorded whenever a Senator so requests and one-fifth of the Senate supports his request. Many times the Senate does not care to have a rollcall vote on an amendment because to do so will take anywhere from 6 to 20 minutes where there are at the desk perhaps 100 amendments which have little or no support and Senators are tired from long sessions on a particular measure. They would, many times, prefer not to have a yea-and-nay vote. Under the present rules, the sponsor of the amendment can always have a yea-and-nay vote by simply being sufficiently dilatory that Senators would rather accord him a rollcall than to suffer the delay that it would otherwise cause them. Where a quorum is present, under the rule I am proposing, a majority leader—or manager of the bill—could bring the matter to a quick decision by obtaining recognition, asking for a brief limitation on debate and, failing to obtain the same, moving to lay the amendment on the table. Under the existing rules, a Senator who might have only his own vote in favor of his amendment could suggest the absence of a quorum. When the roll had been called and a quorum determined to be present he can then suggest the absence of a quorum again. That is how he can do it now. Upon being informed that no business had transpired since the previous quorum, he then need only appeal from the ruling of the Chair and, upon being voted down by the Senate, it would then be in order to suggest the absence of a quorum again. In this fashion, a single Senator, without the support of anyone else, can keep the clerk calling the roll all night long without the necessity of even making a speech in support of his position. This is a ridiculous situation.

So long as we retain these archaic rules, I reserve to myself the right to take full advantage of them.

Like everyone else in government, I have but one complaint—that I have so little influence. Like everyone else, I am convinced that everything which is wrong about this Government could be corrected if everyone would do exactly as I think they should do. I am sure that every President and most Senators who have served here for 20 years have probably shared or come near sharing that view.

But a legislative body must find ways to permit the majority view to prevail and, as I have said before, the Senate is inexcusably inefficient, in according a small minority, sometimes a minority of merely one, the right to so greatly impede a majority of 99 percent.

What I am suggesting would still permit a single Senator to delay the Senate for a long time—a day or even two days at a time—and a lot longer than that if anyone agreed with him sufficiently to do anything about it.

A third proposed change of the rules which I am offering—Senate Resolution 379—would provide that, when a rollcall vote is taken, a Senator entering the Chamber within 5 minutes after the result has been announced could be recorded as voting—provided it did not change the result. If the result would be changed then a motion to reconsider would be in order, as indeed it would be under the present rules. This should reduce the time for the average rollcall from 15 minutes to about 10.

The only argument that occurs to me against this proposal is that it might hurt attendance on the floor. This argument I would answer: There is nothing that anyone can do that would hurt attendance on the floor. Most of the time there is no Senator on the floor anyway except one who is making the speech, one who is caught in the chair of the Presiding Officer, and two who have been recruited to protect the majority and minority leaders and their rights on the floor. To that number should be added two, or perhaps three others waiting their turns to speak or to insert something in the RECORD.

It may be precarious to say what I am going to say next, but Senators know this is true: on most rollcall votes the majority of the Senators come into the Chamber without having heard what was said immediately prior to the vote. They inquire of someone in whom they have confidence what the vote is all about, decide how they want to vote, and proceed to do so with no more than 60 seconds of explanation although the matter may have been the subject of several hours of debate. Obviously, the measures have been much better considered than this statement would indicate. Consideration within the legislative committees has been much more thorough. Senators on both sides have undertaken to acquaint others with their views over luncheon tables or by buttonholing them on the floor or in the cloakroom. Even so, the suggestion that anything is to be gained by continuing the present method—if indeed it be a method at all—of obtaining a required number of Senators to be present at the moment of the vote in order to be recorded has nothing to offer.

As a matter of fact, it will help to improve attendance in the Senate to know that Senators can expect something to happen if they will stick around for a while, rather than the present situation which guarantees that nothing will happen at any time soon, with the result that Senators find it more productive to spend their time somewhere other than on the floor of the Senate. There is a better prospect of something happening if a Senator is on the floor when the Senate is not wasting its time calling the role or stalling to prevent announcing the result of a vote while waiting for someone in the gym to finish his shower, don his clothes, and rush to the floor. It is amusing how one ridiculous system leads to another. One of the reasons it takes so long to muster a quorum or to complete a rollcall is that some Senators are in the gym getting their daily exercise. The reason they must get that exercise while the Senate is in session is that it takes so long to ever get anything done that the Senate stays in session long hours and practically all year long. The fact that it takes so long to bring a matter to a vote on the Senate floor is the largest single reason why 80 percent of the Senators are not on the floor except when a rollcall vote is being taken.

A fourth proposed change of the rule which I am offering—Senate Resolution 380—is that when a Senator has agreed to accord another Senator a live pair, both Senators should be recorded as voting rather than having both of them recorded as not voting. This proposed change of the rule would not in any way affect the fact that 51 Senators must be present and voting in order for the vote to be effective. Beyond that fact, it serves no purpose to require that a Senator be present in the Chamber in order for his vote to be recorded, so long as the Senator is well aware of what he is voting on and why.

I can recall occasions when we have hauled dying men into this Chamber on stretchers. For example, when Matt Neely, of West Virginia, was on his deathbed, he was carried into this Chamber to cast a vote in favor of the Democrats organizing the Senate. Everyone who ever knew Matt Neely knew that he was as partisan a Democrat as the Good Lord ever provided to his green earth; nothing on this side of Heaven could prevent him from voting with the Democrats to organize the Senate. No one could have had the least doubt how he wanted to vote. Why need we have hauled him into this body, particularly as one of the kind Senators on the other side of the aisle would have been willing to accord him a pair? In fact, how could our Republican friends have declined to have granted Matt Neely a pair when not to do so would have only produced the scene of this man being carried in on a stretcher. Yet, we still insist on a ridiculous rule which says that even though a man well knows how he wants to be recorded, when he is absent from the Chamber for whatever reason he must be recorded as absent and not voting unless he can persuade someone to respect his position to the extent that that man would decline to vote in order to give the absent member a pair. The pair then is the only means we have to reflect what the true will of the Senate would be if all Senators were respected as representatives of their State rather than what the vote would be if a man dying in a hospital or attending his daughter's wedding were denied the right to have his views reflected on the rollcall. The adoption of the four changes of the rules that I have suggested would not make the Senate an efficient body although it would take us a considerable way in that direction.

The fact that a man giving a pair may also be recorded as present and not voting is adequate excuse for declining to give a pair. This in turn is cause for the party leaders to seek to delay the conclusion of the rollcall until more of their troops are present.

If these should be agreed to, however, it will encourage other Senators to suggest other changes in the rules—indeed, it would encourage this Senator to suggest other changes until we no longer need apologize to the public that we have not discovered the 20th century.

If we will improve our procedures in about a dozen ways along this line, there is absolutely no reason why we cannot do a better job and complete our job in 6 or 7 months, leaving us anywhere from 5 to 6 months during which we can visit and live among the people whom we represent. This will make us reflect more truly their needs and their purposes instead of reading Washington newspapers—good though they may be—and absorbing the Washington point of view until we reflect that point of view rather than the point of view of those who sent us here. We would be better representatives of our people because we would understand their needs and desires much better and they will understand us better.

From a reading of the rules of the Senate one can see, beyond any peradventure of doubt, that these rules predate the invention of the telephone. Indeed, they predate the United States. They had their origin in British parliamentary practice and in Jefferson's Manual, which itself was derived from British practice. When the rules of the Senate were first written it made sense that a Senator should not vote if he were not present. Any proposed measure might be amended or changed during the consideration of the measure; the Senator might not have heard the arguments, facts may be presented which he had not considered. It may very well be that someone with his interests at heart, such as his clerk, knowing all of these facts, would urge him to change his position had he come rushing from his horse up the Senate steps, panting, with his hat in his hand.

Nowadays we have a telephone. While we have yet to install a loudspeaker or pipe the debate into offices of Senators, as we certainly should do, at least a Senator's administrative assistant can sit in the gallery hearing every word that is said, advise his boss of the arguments and help him decide how he wants to be recorded. In the committees, we are well aware of the telephones.

If I might say a word of pride about the Senate Committee on Finance, long before I became chairman of that very fine committee, it was the practice to break a tie by calling absent Senators over the phone and inquire how they would want to vote. I recall that during the Eisenhower administration I was speaking to a convention of the local governing bodies of Louisiana, which in that State is known as the Police Juries. During the course of my speech I was called from the speaker's platform and informed that the Committee on Finance had reached a tie vote on the question of whether the Reciprocal Trade Act, recommended by President Eisenhower, was to be a 3- or a 5-year act. I replied that I would like to be recorded in support of the President for a 5-year act and, thereby, determined the outcome of the decision from 1,100 miles away.

Our current procedure in that same committee is to call a Senator, and when Senators so request, we will permit the Senator on one side of the issue to listen in on an extension and a Senator on another side of the issue to listen in on another extension. Each can explain why they think the Senator should vote on their side and then his vote will be recorded if he wishes it.

In at least one other respect the Senate has learned that there is such a thing as a telephone. Just off this Chamber there is a President's Room which is there in order that the President could have it available to consult with legislative leaders on the last day of a session to assure that matters which he deemed vital were not left undecided when the Senate adjourned sine die. Only once in the 20 years I have been a Senator has a President used the room and then only for the ceremonial signing of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The reason that the room is no longer used for its intended purpose is that Alexander Graham Bell invented the telephone. Nowadays, the leadership on both sides of the aisle goes to the office of the Secretary of the Senate and informs the President that the Senate has concluded its business when we are ready to adjourn sine die, unless the President should object.

There are other things that should be done to modernize the Senate of the United States. We should have an electric voting machine behind the Presiding Officer's desk with buttons on every Senator's desk and a board with red and green lights beside every Senator's name as is the case in most of the State legislatures. Senators of the United States are so reluctant to even permit a machine to be installed that I am not pressing for it at this time. If I am successful in achieving some of these things which commonsense dictates, then I shall, at some future time, risk shocking some Senators by suggesting that we at least try the method of voting which has proved so successful in State legislatures that none of them would consider changing back to the old system.

When one suggests that we should use a voting machine, he is confronted with all sorts of questions for fear that the machine might not fit into our outdated practices. On that score I would only suggest that we should acquire the machine first and then learn how to use it. Like an automobile or a pocket in one's pants, it is so convenient that if one has it he will use it. The only way to keep one from using it is not to have it. I would suggest to Senators, for example, if we had the machine here, could we not agree that, with a rule to permit an absent Senator to be recorded 5 minutes after the vote is announced, and after we had agreed to vote at a moment certain, such as at 10 minutes after 5, might we not save the time of the Senate by using a machine? Better yet, suppose after having agreed to vote at a time certain—reserving Senators the right to be recorded for another 5 minutes—a vote was taken and 100 Senators were present and voting, observing 100 Senators in their seats, could we not then agree that a motion to reconsider and a motion to lay on the table could be taken by the machine? Under our present procedure when a motion is voted and a motion to reconsider is made, it is customary that a motion is then made to lay the motion to recommit on the table.

If this motion is defeated, then the motion to reconsider is taken. If this motion should carry, then the motion on the original question is again voted. Under present procedure, even with everyone present and anxious to vote, these three votes could take 45 minutes. Why should they not be disposed of in 3 minutes, or perhaps 1 minute?

When I was a boy, 12 years of age, I witnessed the sessions of the State Senate of Louisiana prior to the installation of a voting machine in the senate. The house of representatives at that time had a machine and I found myself wondering how long it would take for those old fuddy-duddies in the State senate to wake up to the fact that they, too, needed a machine. Subsequently, it was my privilege to serve as minute clerk when the senate of only 39 men operated with a voting machine. I found myself wondering how that body ever got by prior to the installation of the machine, especially with the large amount of work that was to be done in a 60-day session. When I came to Washington, my administrative assistant, who had worked for two previous Louisiana Senators, told me that I would change my mind about the necessity of a voting machine in the Senate. Yet, every year that I have been here, I have been more convinced than ever that it is utterly ridiculous that we should not have a voting machine.

I well recall the fight over the proposal for public financing of presidential campaigns. The votes were about equally divided. My side won every second critical vote, and the fight lasted for more than a month while first one side and then the other dragged its feet, seeking to bring more of its troops back into town.

This is a sorry way to decide such an important question. It makes better sense to find out how every Senator feels about an issue and let the majority prevail.

The Congressional Quarterly and the press generally have ways to learn how every Senator feels about a matter and who it is—if anybody—truly wants to abstain and remain unrecorded. If newspapers, magazines, radio, and television can do it, why cannot we?

I can think of some reasons why some might think otherwise, but those reasons do not deserve to be explained because they reflect no credit upon the individual or upon the Senate. Any such reason unworthy of being publicly stated should not prevail in this body. I am talking about the individual who might find it to his advantage to be against such release for such reason as not wanting to be on record, for example, on a public issue.

If we will improve our procedures in about a dozen ways along the lines that I have suggested, there is absolutely no reason why we cannot do a better job and complete our work in 6 or 7 months, leaving us anywhere from 5 or 6 months, during which we can visit and live among the people whom we represent. This will make us reflect more truly their needs and their purposes instead of reading Washington newspapers—good though they may be—and absorbing the Washington point of view until we reflect that point of view rather than the point of view of those who sent us here. We would be better representatives of our people because we would understand their needs and desires much better and they will understand us better.

I ask unanimous consent that I may submit at this point the various changes of the rules that I have suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWEIKER). The resolutions will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolutions (S. Res. 377 through S. Res. 380), which read as follows, were referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

S. RES. 377

Resolved, That paragraph 5 of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended to read as follows:

"5. Any committee may sit while the Senate is in session until (1) the conclusion of the morning hour, or (2) the Senate has proceeded to the consideration of unfinished business, pending business, or any other business except private bills and the routine morning business, which ever occurs earlier. Any committee may sit thereafter while the Senate is in session unless the Senate has agreed to a motion to forbid such action by one or more such committees during a designated period of time. Any such motion shall be decided without debate. When any such motion has been agreed to, it may be rescinded by a motion agreed to by majority vote of the Senate. Any such motion to rescind shall be decided without debate.".

Resolved, That paragraphs 2 and 3 of rule V of the Standing Rules of the Senate are amended to read as follows:

"2. On the first occasion during a daily session of the Senate on which a question is raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the Presiding Officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll and shall announce the result. On any subsequent occasion during a daily session of the Senate on which such a question is raised, the presence or absence of a quorum shall be determined in the following manner. If the Presiding Officer believes that a quorum is present, he shall count the Senators present without a call of the roll, and shall announce the result of his count. If the Presiding Officer does not believe that a quorum is present, or if his count of the Senators present does not disclose the presence of a quorum, he shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll and shall announce the result. Proceedings taken under this paragraph shall be without debate.

"3. Whenever it shall be ascertained pursuant to paragraph 2 that a quorum is not present, a majority of the Senators present may direct the Sergeant at Arms to request, and, when necessary, to compel the attendance of the absent Senators, which order shall be determined without debate; and pending its execution, and until a quorum shall be present, no debate nor motion, except to adjourn, shall be in order.".

Resolved, That paragraph 1 of rule XII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended to read as follows:

"1. When the yeas and nays are ordered, the names of Senators shall be called alphabetically; and each Senator shall, without debate, declare his assent or dissent to the question, unless excused by the Senate. Except as provided by this paragraph, no Senator shall be permitted to vote after the decision shall have been announced by the Presiding Officer, but may for sufficient reasons, with unanimous consent, change or withdraw his vote. Within a period of five minutes after the announcement of a decision taken by the Senate by the yeas and nays, any Senator who was absent during the voting shall be entitled to state the vote which he would have cast if he had been present and to request that such vote be recorded as having been so cast. At the end of that period, the Presiding Officer shall determine without debate and announce whether the decision so taken by the Senate would be changed by the recording of all votes of absent Senators so requested during that period. If the Presiding Officer determines that the decision of the Senate would not be changed by the recording of all votes so requested by Senators who were absent, all such votes shall be recorded as having been cast during the yea and nay vote. If the Presiding Officer determines that the decision of the Senate would be changed by the recording of all votes so requested by Senators who were absent, none of the votes of the Senators who were absent shall be recorded as having been cast. No motion to suspend this rule shall be in order, nor shall the Presiding Officer entertain any request to suspend it by unanimous consent.".

S. RES. 380

Resolved, That rule XII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"4. When the yeas and nays are ordered upon any measure or matter, and a Senator who is present has entered into a pair upon that measure or matter with a Senator who is absent, the vote of each Senator who is a party to the pair shall be recorded upon request made by the Senator who is present when his name is called. No absent Senator shall be counted as present in determining whether a quorum is present.".

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Geisler, one of his secretaries.

MANPOWER REPORT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. METCALF) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

To the Congress of the United States:

This first Manpower Report of my Administration recounts the major developments in employment and unemployment during 1969 and the progress we made in that year in reshaping and strengthening existing manpower programs. The report also discusses the contributions of manpower programs to the country's crucial economic objectives—controlling inflation and limiting and mitigating any rise in unemployment.

Despite the significant advances described in this report, our experience during this past year has substantiated what I said last August when I proposed a new Manpower Training Act. I said then that the inefficiencies inherent in the present patchwork of manpower programs were intolerable and that a new legislative approach to manpower problems was in order. I proposed specific reforms at that time and I take this opportunity to urge, once again, their prompt enactment.

Other important topics treated in this Manpower Report include the need for improvements in our Unemployment Insurance system and for fundamental reform of our welfare system. Clearly, these institutions require basic reform if we are to be effective in preventing as well as relieving poverty. I again ask the Congress to act in these significant areas.

Full opportunity for all citizens remains a central goal for this Nation. To achieve that goal will require exceptionally well-constructed and well-administered manpower programs. We have made much progress toward that end in the last year, progress which is detailed in this document. But there is still a great deal to do—and this report is especially valuable because it clarifies and underscores these challenges.

RICHARD NIXON.

The WHITE HOUSE, March 25, 1970.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS WORK STOPPAGE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I wish to say a word about another work stoppage by Government workers; namely, the air traffic controllers, who have pretty much tied up air traffic to New York and, indeed, in other areas across the land.

This is a most unfortunate development in the continuing controversy which has raged between the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Association, called PATCO and the FAA.

Clearly, the stoppage is illegal and cannot be condoned.

The controllers should return to work immediately.

Today's work stoppage is the culmination of many months of rigidity and bitterness and, indeed, some ineptitude in the handling of this dispute by both sides. PATCO and FAA.

Several weeks ago, on the eve of a threatened stoppage, at my suggestion, the parties agreed to call in a Federal mediator to help them resolve their differences.

Regrettably, both sides appear to have so limited the mediator's functions as to make it impossible for him to offer any meaningful help in resolving the controversy.

I believe that, in the public interest—bearing in mind that I first believe that the controllers must return to work—a full-scale inquiry into the conduct of all parties to this dispute and the grievances which have been expressed by the air traffic controllers themselves—many of which grievances are, in fact, justified—should be undertaken by the congressional committees concerned with our air transportation system.

Congress and the public are entitled to a full explanation of the circumstances which have led up to the crisis in the air transportation field which is now facing us.

I believe such an inquiry will show that the work stoppage today could have been avoided by reasonable measures had the parties to the dispute acted providently.

Mr. President, I also believe that this work stoppage and the postal strike, which still goes on in New York, indicates that there is something radically wrong with our system of dealing with Government employee grievances. A way must be found to achieve better communication between Government agencies and the representatives of their employees, as well as better bargaining techniques calculated to avoid rigidity on either side.

Continuance of the present policy can only lead to a tragic polarization of feeling between the Government and its employees and ultimately to the use of troops—which I understand was necessary but could have been avoided—or other drastic measures in public employee labor disputes such as prosecutions under the penal law, which would further embitter the situation.

No country can stand extensive labor disputes and work stoppages against the Government. We should be vigilant to prevent matters from getting to that pass.

I deeply believe our procedures are very archaic in this matter. I think the President is trying to improve them. But they do not begin to do the job.

I think the postal strike and the work stoppage by the air traffic controllers are of sufficient severity that Congress should get on top of them now. I hope that we will get to work on the matter.

I urge the air traffic controllers to come back to work. I think that is their best course, having made their point and having called attention in many respects to their grievances which, as I say, are quite justified.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE CARSWELL NOMINATION

Mr. HART. Mr. President, the legislative voice of the city of Detroit is its common council. It has voiced its position with respect to the pending nomination to the Supreme Court of Judge Carswell.

It would be a mistake for me to attempt to elaborate on that expression. It speaks to the point and concludes that the nomination should be opposed.

I think this position of the common council reflects the feeling of the great majority of the people of the city of Detroit.

For the information of all Senators, and I hope with some persuasive effects, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution of the common council which was sent over the signature of George C. Edwards, its city clerk, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION OF THE CITY OF DETROIT
MARCH 12, 1970
(By Councilman Ravitz)

Whereas, In 1948, G. Harrold Carswell spoke in favor of racial segregation and thought so highly of his speech that he had it published in his weekly newspaper, and

Whereas, In 1956, Judge Carswell helped organize a group to buy the Tallahassee Municipal Golf Course to convert it to a private club that would bar black people, and

Whereas, In 1966 Judge Carswell participated in a land sale with a restrictive racial covenant in it, even though the Supreme Court had outlawed such covenants in 1954, and

Whereas, Countless distinguished attorneys have testified that Judge Carswell has exhibited his hostility to them and to the cause of civil rights for their advocacy of these rights, and

Whereas, Numerous legal scholars from all over the country have declared in writing that Judge Carswell's level of legal competence is far below the standards acceptable for the United States Supreme Court;

Now, Therefore, Be It Resolved, That the Common Council call upon U.S. Senators Hart and Griffin to vote against confirmation of the nomination of Judge Carswell when the matter is brought to the floor of the Senate, and

Be It Further Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent promptly to the two Senators from Michigan and to the President of the United States.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senate, I am about to propound a unanimous-consent request. I wish to do it personally, so that I will make sure that all the corners are covered, and if I am not doing so, I will be called to account.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that upon completion of the Senate's business on Tuesday next, the Senate recess in legislative session until 12 o'clock noon on Wednesday, April 1, 1970; and further, that immediately after the prayer, the conference report on H.R. 514 be placed before the Senate, and the debate thereon be limited to 4 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL) and the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS) or whomsoever they shall designate; and that the vote on the Stennis motion to recommit the conference report occur at 4 p.m.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. PELL. Did the Senator mean that there was to be a vote on the Stennis amendment at 4 p.m.?

Mr. MANSFIELD. On the Stennis motion; and that after that is disposed of, and not to exceed 1 hour later, there be a vote on the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWEIKER). The Chair would state that the conference report is not open to amendment, and no amendment could be voted on.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I was referring to the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to recommit; and that after that is disposed of, there be a vote on the conference report itself within 1 hour thereafter.

Mr. ALLEN. If it is still pending.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes, if it is still pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would state—will the Senator finish his statement?

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is the statement. Up to that point, is it understood?

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, one other point if the Senator will yield. It is understood that the Stennis motion to recommit will be concerned with the so-called Stennis amendment?

Mr. STENNIS. That is correct, Mr. President. May I ask the majority leader a question at this point?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes.

Mr. STENNIS. If the Senator will yield to me.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes, indeed.

Mr. STENNIS. I just stated that the motion the Senator from Mississippi has in mind would be on the amendment referred to by the Senator from New York.

I have in mind, now, a general motion to recommit generally, without assigning all the reasons. There may be others who would want to be more specific.

It has been agreed, as I understand, that they would have a chance to offer that if there is either an amendment to my motion or another motion to recommit. Say, it refers to section (c). I want that clearly understood—that no one else is cut off and that some time be allowed.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the intention of the majority leader—and he will correct me if I am wrong—is that when the 1 hour debate has expired after the vote on the Stennis motion to recommit, concerned with the Stennis amendment—however he may phrase it—that during that hour if he or Senator PELL yields time, or even without time, another Member might make a motion to recommit. That will then be voted on immediately before the vote up or down on the conference report. Assuming that the conference report still survives, it will be voted on up or down within 1 hour after—that is, when the 1 hour expires—after the first vote on the Stennis motion.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I concur completely with the Senator from New York's explanation.

Mr. JAVITS. Is that all right with the Parliamentarian?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would ask if the motion to recommit with instructions is solely limited to the Stennis amendment.

Mr. JAVITS. As I understand it, the parties on the other side, Senator STENNIS included, say that the first motion which we will face within 4 hours after 12 o'clock on Wednesday will be a motion to recommit, with instructions, or some motion regarding the Stennis amendment. The Senator then says that in the succeeding hour after that is voted on, assuming that the conference report is still before us, there may be other motions to recommit also regarding the Stennis amendment; whatever there is will then be voted on immediately before the vote up or down.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It need not be limited to the Stennis amendment.

Mr. JAVITS. It need not. I will accept that. Any other motion to recommit will then come between the time of voting on the Stennis amendment and 1 hour thereafter.

As I understand the parliamentary rule, it must be voted on after the time has expired—to wit, 1 hour—and immediately thereafter the unanimous-consent request calls for a vote, up or down, on the conference report, assuming that it is still before us.

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. STENNIS. Reserving the right to object, it seems to me that the time for debate on any of the motions to recommit, in addition to the general one I alluded to, should come before the beginning of this 1-hour debate on the conference report as a whole. It was a bill. So if some time will be allowed——

Mr. MANSFIELD. The time would be under the control of the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. STENNIS. There are only 2 hours in all for each side. Suppose we might have—I do not know whether we will, but suppose we might have three or four proposals, motions to recommit, with a specific instruction. It would take more than the 2 hours for each side, perhaps.

Mr. MANSFIELD. How about 6 hours, and we will come in at 10 o'clock?

Mr. STENNIS. That would be all right, just so that there is enough time to argue them. I do not want to delay.

Mr. JAVITS. Six hours is fine.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I change the request so that the time to be divided before the vote at 4 o'clock will be 6 hours equally divided.

Mr. JAVITS. We will come in at 10 a.m. and vote at 4 p.m. on the Stennis amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Montana restate the last point?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I just changed the hours to be allocated from 4 to 6 hours, the rest of the proposal to remain as is.

Mr. GRIFFIN. And to come in at 10 o'clock.

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is implied. We will get to that specific request later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. ALLEN. Reserving the right to object, I think there is more to come, and I would like to hear the rest of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will proceed.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—unless I misunderstand the situation, I understood that the unanimous-consent agreement would also fix a time for the vote on the Carswell nomination.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I am getting to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair just stated that the Senator was to proceed with the whole package.

Mr. HOLLAND. I understand that the Presiding Officer was about to put the question on the package up to now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair amended that.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Presiding Officer.

Mr. MANSFIELD (continuing). That upon the completion of the Senate's business on Friday, April 3, 1970, the Senate recess, in executive session, until 10 a.m., Monday, April 6, 1970; that immediately after the prayer on Monday, April 6, the Chair will place before the Senate the nomination of G. Harrold Carswell. At that time, if such a motion has not previously been offered—that is, during the previous week—the Senator from Indiana (Mr. BAYH) or his designee will move that the nomination of G. Harrold Carswell be recommitted to the Judiciary Committee; that the debate on that motion on Monday, April 6, will be limited to 3 hours, to be equally divided between and controlled by the mover of the motion and the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. HRUSKA) or whomsoever they may designate.

Further, that the vote on the motion to recommit will occur at 1 p.m., Monday, April 6, 1970—the Senate convening that day at 10 o'clock—or as soon thereafter, as a motion to table the recommital motion is disposed of, if such a motion to table is made; that if the motion to recommit the nomination on Monday, April 6, 1970, at 1 p.m., does not prevail, or the motion to table the recommital motion does prevail then the vote on the confirmation of the nomination of G. Harrold Carswell will occur at 1 p.m. on Wednesday, April 8, 1970.

Mr. SCOTT. Following 3 hours of debate.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Following 3 hours of debate.

Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. BROOKE. Would there be an opportunity for a motion to table on Wednesday?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes, indeed.

Mr. BROOKE. Would that be written into the consent agreement, as well?

Mr. MANSFIELD. That motion, may I say, always is in order.

Mr. BROOKE. We have spelled it out on Monday, and I think we ought to be able to spell it out on Wednesday.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, it is not my information that a motion to table would always be in order if there is a unanimous-consent agreement to vote at a time specific, and I should like to have some information on that from the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is correct, that normally the situation would preclude a motion to table. But the way the question was stated, the agreement does include a motion to table as a possibility.

Mr. HRUSKA. And when would that motion to table be eligible?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At 1 o'clock after debate.

Mr. HRUSKA. At the conclusion of the debate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. HRUSKA. To be followed by a vote on the nomination proper, depending upon the outcome of the vote?

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is correct.

Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, I am asking the majority leader if that will be written in the unanimous-consent agreement

Mr. MANSFIELD. We will be glad to write it in, to make sure, and I add it to the unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr President, I reserve the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I want to commend the distinguished majority leader for reconciling the irreconcilable and coming up with this request, which seems to meet with general approval. I would like to inquire as to what the pending business will be before the Senate if the agreement is made.

Mr. MANSFIELD. We will go back on the Carswell nomination. I daresay there will be little speaking on that, but the Senate will then proceed to the consideration of the stockpile bills, the extension of Hill-Burton, the rural telephone bill, and other measures. There is plenty to occupy the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The unanimous-consent agreements, later reduced to writing, are as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Ordered, that effective after the prayer on Wednesday, April 1, 1970 (with the Senate convening in legislative session at 10 a.m.), further debate on the conference report on H.R. 514, primary and secondary education, be limited to six hours with the time to be equally divided and controlled by the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL) and the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS), after which the Senate will immediately proceed to vote on the Stennis motion to recommit, with or without instructions. After the vote on the Stennis motion there will be an hour of debate on adoption of the report should the Stennis motion fail with the time to be equally divided and controlled by the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL) and the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS), following which any other motions to recommit with or without instructions if offered will be voted on without further debate, to be followed by a vote on the adoption of the conference report if it has not otherwise been disposed of.

UNANIMOUS CONSENT AGREEMENT

Ordered, that effective on Monday, April 6, 1970, (with the Senate convening in executive session at 10 a.m.) further debate on the nomination of G. Harrold Carswell to be Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court, with the pending question on the motion of the Senator from Indiana (Mr. Bayh), to recommit the nomination to the Committee on the Judiciary, be limited to three hours to be equally divided and controlled by the Senator from Indiana (Mr. Bayh) and the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. Hruska), or whomever they may designate, with the vote coming at 1 o'clock, or following a vote on a motion to table the motion to recommit if such a motion should first be offered. Following the above vote or votes the Senate will proceed to vote on the confirmation of the nomination at 1 o'clock on April 8, 1970, or following the vote on a motion to table the nomination should such motion be made, and if the nomination is still before the Senate.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT FROM TUESDAY, MARCH 31, TO WEDNESDAY, APRIL 1, 1970, AT 10 A.M.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of business on Tuesday, March 31, 1970, the Senate stand in adjournment until 10 o'clock a.m. on Wednesday next, April 1, 1970.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT FROM FRIDAY, APRIL 3, 1970, UNTIL 10 O'CLOCK A.M. THE FOLLOWING MONDAY, APRIL 6, 1970

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of business on Friday next, April 3, 1970, the Senate stand in adjournment until 10 o'clock a.m. the following Monday, April 6, 1970.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT FROM TUESDAY, APRIL 7, 1970, UNTIL WEDNESDAY, APRIL 8, 1970, AT 10 A.M.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of business on Tuesday, April 7, 1970, a week from this Tuesday, the Senate stand in adjournment until 10 o'clock the next morning, Wednesday, April 8, 1970.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I should like for the RECORD to show that I hope the majority leader's request for coming in at 10 a.m. tomorrow morning does not rely on the need to move to the second order of business alluded to in the last part of the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Well, time and the Senate will tell.

All I can say is thanks.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR YOUNG OF OHIO TOMORROW

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON) completes his remarks tomorrow, the Senator from Ohio (Mr. YOUNG) be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. It is my understanding that no rollcall votes are planned for tomorrow, or for Tuesday next. Would that be the understanding of the majority leader?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Not necessarily, because there are a number of stockpile bills—16, I believe. There is also the question of the Hill-Burton extension, and the question of the rural telephone extension. If the appropriate Members are here, it is possible that there would be votes on these measures.

I see the distinguished Senator from Delaware (Mr. WILLIAMS) is in the Chamber. He has a vital interest in the stockpile bills and has served notice that he has an amendment to offer to each of those bills. If appropriate Senators are on the floor, we would like to take them up and get them out of the way.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Let me say to the distinguished majority leader that there will be some votes on those bills.

Mr. MANSFIELD. It all depends, but it appears that there will be no postal legislation this week. The conferees are meeting, and the possibility that we would have had to remain in session over the two-day recess I think has been negated because of that fact.

Mr. SCOTT. I thank the majority leader.

ORDER FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, following the two special orders previously alluded to, there be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR LIMITATION ON STATEMENTS DURING TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS ON TOMORROW

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during the period for the transaction of routine morning business on tomorrow, statements therein be limited to 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call will be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR AIKEN TOMORROW

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, at the conclusion of the remarks by the able Senator from Ohio (Mr. YOUNG), the able senior Senator from Vermont (Mr. AIKEN) be recognized for not to exceed 30 minutes, prior to the period for the transaction of routine morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, if there be no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate stand in adjournment until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 9 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, March 26, 1970, at 10 a.m.

CONFIRMATION

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 25, 1970:

FEDERAL NATIONAL MORTGAGE ASSOCIATION

Allan Oakley Hunter, of California, to be President of the Federal National Mortgage Association.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, March, 25, 1970

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. W. Christopher Hobgood, First Christian Church, Alexandria, Va., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we beseech guidance on this Hall. Here wars have been declared, peace celebrated, accomplishments recognized, and the Nation's directions have taken form.

Remind us that we harm history by not recognizing the purpose of the past, and do greater harm by not seeing our opportunities today.

In this land of promise, make us good stewards of the natural world; workers for justice; advocates of the day when "swords will become plowshares"; persons committed to excellence of ideal.

Bless the women and men who shape legislation here, with wisdom to know right and compassion to see every person as precious.

That peace and hope may be central so that all may be free to celebrate life's goodness, we dedicate today in this great House. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Arrington, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 4148) entitled "An act to amend the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, as amended, and for other purposes."

THE PRESIDENTIAL MESSAGE ON DESEGREGATION—THE SAME OLD STORY

(Mr. FLOWERS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FLOWERS. Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned, the much-publicized Presidential message on desegregation simply amounted to a rehash of the same old story. While showing some real fancy footwork and trying to be all things to all people, I am afraid that what the President has really done is add his support to the dual standard and unequal treatment for the South that had already been established by the Supreme Court and HEW.

From the statement we can only conclude that freedom of choice is the law of the land everywhere but in the South. Forced busing is undesirable everywhere but in the South. The neighborhood school concept is good for everybody except us in the South and by engaging in rhetoric about the de facto and de jure differences in the origin of any segregation in education, the President is really saying to the North, East, and West that you can go ahead with yours the way it always has been but we are going to keep putting pressure on the South.

I do not know how this message will be received by others but I, for one, have just about had enough of this playing politics with our schools. We are either going to have a single national policy with single national standards or we are not, and they are not going to fool me with this cute distinction of what segregation is founded on neighborhood housing patterns and what began as a matter of law.

COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendments:

On page 1, line 1, delete "That, effective January 3, 1970," and insert in lieu thereof "That the further".

On page 1, line 5, strike out "$480,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$450,000".

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, with my usual benign consideration for the sensibilities of other Members, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. RYAN) for his annual speech on this resolution.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, at least the gentleman from Ohio did not refer to "benign neglect," and I appreciate his benign compassion.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is correct. As the House well knows, I do rise annually on the floor to protest the extravagant and exorbitant amount of money voted routinely for the Un-American Activities Committee, now dubbed the House Internal Security Committee.

But a rose by any other name, the old saying goes, smells the same.

We are here faced with a request for some $450,000, almost a half million dollars, to finance the activities of this committee for the forthcoming year.

Last year the amount was $400,000. I do not know what has transpired in the last year to justify an increase of $50,000. But at a time when Members of this House are constantly expressing their concern about inflation and Government spending, it would seem to me that the first place we should cut is the budget of this committee.

In 1968 the appropriation was $375,000; in 1967 it was $350,000. Without rhyme or reason, it snowballs each year.

The history of the committee is clear. I have repeated year after year on this floor, as have others, how it has infringed on basic civil liberties; how it has brought shame and discredit through its procedures and through the nature of its hearings upon the House of Representatives; how it is practically barren of any legislative activity.

The old saw about throwing good money after bad is exactly on point here.

The mandate in rule XI of the House Rules for the Internal Security Committee is so broad ranging and vague that the committee in effect has carte blanche to undertake intrusive investigation into virtually every organization and person who perceives ills in our society and seeks to ameliorate them. The committee's very existence signals the urge toward repression which is egging on bigotry throughout our Nation.

What is more, the powers of the House Internal Security Committee encroaches upon the jurisdiction of other committees of the House. This is particularly true in regard to the Judiciary Committee, which has traditionally had jurisdiction over matters of espionage, sedition, and the criminal penalties associated with these crimes.

Nor can this request for $450,000 be considered in isolation from past history. The name may be different but the aims are the same. The House Internal Security Committee remains, in purpose and in intent, the direct successor to the House Un-American Activities Committee. As did HUAC, so does this committee serve, as I said last April 1 when I opposed the appropriation for this Committee, "to harass and expose, not to investigate."

Past legislative history dictates rejection of the current appropriation recommendation of $450,000. Throughout its history only six bills reported out of this committee and its predecessor have been enacted into law. During the 89th Congress not one bill reported out was passed by this House. In the 90th Congress one bill was passed by both Houses of Congress and signed into law. Thus far, in the 91st Congress, only one bill reported out—H.R. 14864—has been passed by this House. And as I said on January 29 in opposition to H.R. 14864:

Virtually every section . . . is objectionable for its infringement upon individual liberties.

This is quite a costly record the people of this country have been bearing—not only in terms of the objectionable nature of the legislation reported out of the House Internal Security Committee, but, as well, in terms of the meager production for which so much money has been spent.

The record of the first session of this Congress amply demonstrates the total lack of legislative need for this Committee. In 1969, 15,434 bills were introduced in the House. Almost unbelievably, only 25 bills were referred to the House Internal Security Committee. And of these 25, 20 were either identical to each other or very similar. Thus, the grand total of substantive legislation before this Committee in 1969 amounted to five bills—a number so small as to make the current recommendation for $450,000 ludicrous.

But the story does not end at this point. All five of these bills properly belonged within the jurisdiction of other committees.

Let me briefly outline the status of each of these bills referred to the Internal Security Committee.

H.R. 384, introduced January 3, 1969, requires the Attorney General to maintain a register of Communist-action, Communist-front, and Communist-infiltrated organizations. The bill is currently in committee, as well it might be, since this or similar bills have been introduced in the last four Congresses without ever having been reported out.

H.R. 959, introduced January 3, 1969, proscribes two types of activities: obstructing movement of military personnel or supplies; and giving aid to nations with which the United States is engaged in armed conflict. Almost the identical bill was introduced in the 89th Congress as H.R. 11864, and was then referred to the Judiciary Committee. H.R. 959 is currently in committee—hearings were held on September 15 and 16. The statements of J. Walter Yeagley, Assistant Attorney General, Internal Security Division, Department of Justice, before the Subcommittee of the Committee on Internal Security holding hearings on H.R. 959 on September 15, 1969, shows that even the administration sees no need for this legislation. Assistant Attorney General Yeagley said:

The Department of Justice, as stated in the report from the Deputy Attorney General, knows of no compelling need, from a legal or factual standpoint, for this proposed legislation.

H.R. 11731, introduced on May 27, 1969, in effect makes dissent on college campuses criminal. The bill proscribes acts of force, threats of such acts, occupying of buildings, and "any other overt act in violation of any provision of law or any duly adopted rule or regulation promulgated by appropriate administrative authority of such federally assisted institution" willfully committed with intent to prevent, obstruct, or interfere with the orderly administration or operation of a federally assisted institution. Like the other bills, H.R. 11731 is in committee. Its concern with activities on college campuses likens it to H.R. 10940 and H.R. 13842, both of which were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

H.R. 11825 and numerous similar bills provide for repeal of the Emergency Detention Act of 1950, which is title II of the Internal Security Act of 1950. Hearings on these bills began last week, on March 16. Again, this same subject matter is before the Judiciary Committee.

to which has been referred H.R. 11373 and other bills.

H.R. 14864, passed by the House on January 29, is entitled the Defense Facilities and Industrial Security Act of 1970. The Washington Post well characterized this piece of legislation, when it said in its editorial of January 29:

Behind this malevolent and maladroit piece of legislation lies the misconception that lay behind the McCarthy hysteria of the 1950s—the misconception that the way to promote national security is to mistrust all Americans and to judge their suitability for employment in terms of the conventionality of their ideas.

Again, the Judiciary Committee would well have considered this bill, as it does those other bills referred to it, such as H.R. 725, which concern strengthening of our internal security.

The legislation referred to the House Internal Security Committee clearly could have been, and should have been, considered by other committees of this House—in most cases, the Judiciary Committee. Thus, apart from the philosophical and political offensiveness of this committee, there is as well its moribund legislative role warranting cessation of its funding.

The price the taxpayer pays for this body is, in monetary terms alone, a stiff one. Firstly, it should be pointed out that as of December 31, 1969, the House Internal Security Committee had the fifth largest staff—48 people—of the 21 standing committees provided for by rule X of the House rules. The following chart shows comparative staff sizes and rankings:

Appropriations	95	1

Agriculture	100,000	100,000
Veterans Affairs	100,000	100,000
Interior and Insular Affairs	80,000	80,000

The $400,000 which was appropriated last year for the House Internal Security Committee was not the limit of the funds available to it. Additional funds derived to it, as to other committees, under the Legislative Appropriation Act, Public Law 91–145. From July 1, 1969, through December 31, 1969, these funds covered $103,139.71 paid in salaries to the standing committee staff of the House Internal Security Committee. For the year, this staff received a total amount of $198,652.18, which, as I said, was not expended out of the funds appropriated by a House resolution, such as we have before us today.

Mr. Speaker, neither legislative goals, philosophy, nor economy justify the existence of the Committee on Internal Security. To the contrary, they all call for its dissolution. The committee serves no ends save repression and harassment. It accomplishes nothing of benefit, and works only to the detriment of the public and of this House.

Mr. Speaker, the utter lack of justification for the existence of the Internal Security Committee—a committee having the fifth largest staff of any standing committee this past year and the sixth largest appropriation recommendation today—urges us all to reject H. Res. 844, calling for an appropriation of $450,000. Not only is there no legislation which requires continuation of the activities of this committee, but its infringement of civil liberties and its tarnishing of the prestige and reputation of many of the individuals who appear before it, compel the committee's discontinuation.

By approving the request of funds, the House will thereby sanction the excesses and outrages of this committee, and the waste of money its existence means. The time is past due for the House to withdraw that sanction, which it has mistakenly tendered in years past. I urge my colleagues to vote for civil liberties and individual liberty—and this means a vote against H. Res. 844.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield an additional minute?

Mr. HAYS. No; I cannot yield any more. There is a lot of other legislation to come up today. I am sorry.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 307, nays 52, not voting 71, as follows:

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. HELSTOSKI. Mr. Speaker, on rollcall No. 61, on yesterday, I am recorded as not voting. At the time of the vote, I was in conference with the Legislative Counsel for the purpose of drafting legislation which could avert future mail strikes.

Had I been present on the floor, I would have voted "nay" on the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's statement will appear in the RECORD.

GENERAL LEAVE ON SPECIAL ORDER

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 days in which to extend their remarks and include extraneous matter on the subject of my special order on March 24.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

DOCUMENTARY ON LIFE OF THE LATE DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING

(Mr. CONYERS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to commend to the attention of my colleagues the film on the life of the late Dr. Martin Luther King. Last night this film was shown in 1,000 theaters across this Nation. Its objective was to raise funds for the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, one of the truly dedicated civil rights organizations in the country, and to educate and inform our citizens of one of the most stirring and compelling dramas of our time, the struggle for equality in America.

The film was entitled, "King: From Montgomery to Memphis," and although I had been privileged to have participated in some of the events that were shown in the film, I was spellbound from beginning to end. It was a magnificent motion picture in every way, and was easily the most moving documentary I have ever seen. I was pleased that there were other Members from this body present but I am contacting today the noble wife of this great leader, Mrs. Coretta Scott King, to find out if this film can be shown again. I believe it should be made available not only to my colleagues who need to see it, but to young people of all races and creeds in this country who must get a clear and honest picture of a struggle that has been going on as long as this country is old.

On a personal note, let me confide with you that the greatest person, the most moving human being, that I have ever been privileged to meet and work with was the late Dr. Martin Luther King. Even now he still serves as my model, and although I am hardly able to walk in the footprints of this man who truly was a legend in his own time, I nevertheless study his sermons, read his speeches, and try, no matter how unsuccesfully, to live and work as he would have wanted me to. And thus, here in the Congress, I hope to honor the memory of Martin Luther King by living out and putting into action his lofty ideals and aspirations.

THE DOCUMENTARY: "KING FROM MONTGOMERY TO MEMPHIS"

(Mr. RYAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to join our colleague from Michigan (Mr. CONYERS) in strongly recommending that every Member of this body see that very powerful documentary which was exhibited throughout the Nation last night entitled "King: From Montgomery to Memphis." It describes powerfully and graphically the epic struggle, which the Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., led during his lifetime, which continues, and to which all of us should be committed, and the ideals of Dr. King which the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CONYERS) serves so well and exemplifies in his own conduct and in his own efforts to bring about racial reconciliation and social reconstruction in our country.

This documentary is a moving tribute to Dr. King. It captures his eloquence and dedication, and it makes clear the urgency of moving ahead in this Nation to meet his goals so that we are in fact one Nation, indivisible.

The moving words of Martin Luther King, Jr., on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial in August 1963, recalled to us last night, ring out:

Free at last, free at last, free at last.

Mr. Speaker, Martin Luther King, Jr., is free now of the evils which afflict our Nation and our world. But he has left us an obligation and a duty which not one of us can shirk, not one of us can disavow. We must struggle and work and persevere until real freedom rings across this country.

To Ely Landau and the rest of the masterful artists who created this beautiful and tragic film, I offer my gratitude. They have given all of us a renewed opportunity to witness the greatness of the Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and to renew again our commitment to the peace, the justice, and the brotherhood he so selflessly sought.

MARTIN LUTHER KING MOVIE

Mr. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, last night I was privileged to see the powerful and moving view of "Martin Luther King—Montgomery to Memphis."

The impact of this great man was powerfully presented and the message of the nonviolence he preached rang out from the screen as eloquently as when these words were uttered by him.

Certainly one felt the impact again of the great sense of loss which his death caused. A loss felt by those who sought justice and peace the world over. But the remainder of the loss served to refocus attention on his challenge and on the work left to be done.

I intend to join in the effort to see that there is a special showing again on the Hill so that Members who may have missed it, will have the opportunity to view the magnificent film.

It is my firm hope that, in addition, this film be made available to the schoolchildren of this Nation so that they might share the hopes and inspiration of the late Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

ARE WE A DELIBERATIVE BODY?

(Mr. ASHBROOK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous material.)

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, as one who always tries to uphold the prerogative of the House and always tries to speak out when we are criticized, I find myself time and time again confronted with those who appear to believe that the House of Representatives is not the deliberative body that it should be.

A very innocent case in point is revealed in a telegram I received this morning from Mr. William C. Becker, who is president of the United Community Council of Summit County, which is Akron, Ohio. I point this out to the Members to show how the idea of our legislative inferiority is so ingrained in the minds of so many people in the country.

Listen to what he says:

We are not completely satisfied with the bill—

Referring to the welfare bill—

in all respects. However, we believe that this bill should be passed by the House at this time in order that it may be debated fully in the United States Senate, where an opportunity to amend its objectionable portions might be forthcoming. We urge your complete and wholehearted support of this important legislation.

Get that again, the idea that we support legislation in this House that our constituents think is not exactly what it should be, and we get it out of the way and then we send it to the other deliberative body. They then can do what needs to be done by amendment on the Senate floor, decide whether they want to add to it or subtract from it, or whatever their thought might be.

So there are many people in this country who believe today that the other body is the deliberative body. This is an innocent presumption from this particular person, and it reaffirms my conviction that we should reform some of our House rules and make this the kind of deliberative body it should be.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 4148, WATER QUALITY IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1970

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 4148) to amend the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, as amended, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers on the part of the House be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The clerk read the statement.

(For conference report and statement, see proceedings of the House of March 24, 1970.)

Mr. FALLON. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. BLATNIK).

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, for many years I have risen in the well of this House to urge support of a meaningful water pollution program and over the years this House has consistently supported an ever-increasing and more far-reaching legislation to cover the means to guarantee pure water for all Americans.

I appear here on this floor today to urge adoption of the conference report on H.R. 4148. This is legislation which is another great step forward in our continuing battle to maintain the purity of our Nation's waters.

There are not many pieces of legislation which one can call "landmark" legislation. H.R. 4148 is in that category. It comes to this body for final approval today after some 2½ years or arduous work by both bodies of the Congress.

This conference report has been hammered out after long weeks and months of discussions in conference. It breaks into many new fields in our effort to curb the ever-growing threat of the pollution of our Nation's waters whether they be along our coast or inland waterways.

It contains such features as control of pollution by oil. It establishes for the first time in this category a clean-up authority; it also places strict features of liability on those who would ship oil. In the matter of vessels it establishes a category of $100 per gross ton or $14 million liability whichever is the lesser and in the field of on-shore and off-shore installations the figure is $8 million.

It moves into the area of operation of the small boat owners who move across our Nation's waterways in ever increasing thousands. It provides the basis for a meaningful control of pollution discharge from these vessels under the rules and regulations to be worked out jointly by the U.S. Coast Guard and the Secretary of the Interior.

For the first time it establishes a requirement that when those who seek a license or permit from a Federal agency for the use of our Nation's waters whether it be to build nuclear power plants, steam powerplants or any other uses of our navigable waters they must give reasonable assurances that the operation of whatever they seek to require a permit for, will not lower the water pollution standards of the waters of a particular State. It goes into the field of acid mine drainage research, pollution control in the Great Lakes, land acquisition for field laboratories for the studying of various forms of pollution; oil pollution removal research; extension of the basic research authorization program now in existing law; a clean lakes research section; language to require development of scientific knowledge on the effects of pesticides in the environment, a pilot training program and an additional program to give those who would operate our Nation's sanitary facilities the best background and experience to carry out the job for staffing for our all important Council on Environmental Quality. These, among many, are the highlights of this legislation. I could go on at length about its many features. Time does not permit. Suffice to say that today this is vital, necessary and important legislation. I am proud to have been a part of its development both in the Committee on Public Works and on the conference with the other body. I am particularly proud of my fellow conferees, the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. JONES); the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT); the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. FALLON); our distinguished chairman of the Committee on Public Works; the ranking member of the committee, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. CRAMER); the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HARSHA); and the gentleman from New York (Mr. GROVER).

I strongly support adoption of the conference report.

We had splendid cooperation from all the Members and especially splendid cooperation from the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HARSHA). He is a tireless, persistent worker who wants to know about every dot and comma.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLATNIK. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman's statement, and I agree with him that this is landmark legislation, and certainly it is needed. I join with the gentleman in complimenting the Members who have brought this conference report into being and certainly compliment the members of the committee.

Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman please tell us wherein the Senate amendments differ from the House-passed legislation and the differences in cost authorized in this bill?

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, I do not have the figures here, but we have a detailed analysis of the figures and it will appear in the RECORD at this point.

Mr. Speaker, the total cost for the provisions of this conference report amount to $406 million. That compares to the House version which asked for a total of $368 million, so it is about $58 million more than the House version. The Senate version, as I recall, was higher and we will get the exact figures. I think we worked out a pretty good compromise figure.

Mr. HARSHA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLATNIK. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HARSHA. Mr. Speaker, I would point out in reply to the gentleman from Missouri that in the House bill the revolving fund on oil pollution authorized the expenditure of $20 million, and the Senate asked for $50 million, and we compromised there on $35 million. In addition to that, the Alaska demonstration projects were not included in the House version. The Senate bill called for $5 million for 1970 and unlimited sums for the next 3 years. In addition to that, we agreed to a Senate training amendment adding an additional $17.5 million to that area.

But, in title II, which deals with the Environmental Quality Council and establishment of the Director of Environmental Quality, once more the House bill had no comparable provisions, and we compromised the House version with the Senate version and came up with title II in the conference report which has an authorized expenditure of $3.5 million. There was one other item of research of an additional $1 million. This makes a total increase over the House-passed version of $38 million.

The House-passed version, if I am not mistaken, totaled $368 million.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

If the gentleman will yield further, may I be reassured that all the conferees agreed and that the changes to the House version would be considered germane within the rules of the House?

Mr. BLATNIK. Yes. As far as I know, they are germane within the rules of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for the very thoughtful and generous expression regarding the work on this report.

(Mr. CRAMER (at the request of Mr. HARSHA) was granted permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Speaker, the great American Poet John Greenleaf Whittier wrote:

For of all sad words of tongue or pen, the saddest are these: It might have been!

The conference report we have before us is a good illustration of both the truth of these words on the one hand and the opposite of them on the other hand; for part of what "might have been" would in this case indeed have been very, very sad, but what will be is, as a result of much hard work, much happier.

The Water Quality Improvement Act of 1970 was able, as a result of diligent study and as a result of sad experience, to improve many areas of the Water Quality Improvement Act of 1968, which this House twice passed in that year and which died awaiting Senate action when the 90th Congress came to a close.

An illustration of this, Mr. Speaker, may be found in section 102 of the conference substitute. This section deals with the control of oil pollution. In 1968 the House of Representatives refused to acquiesce to a Senate amendment that would have placed a $5 million limitation of liability on discharges from offshore facilities. Members of this body, and I am proud to say that I was among the leaders of them, refused to give such an obvious bonanza to oil companies operating under leases with the U.S. Government for the purpose of utilizing U.S. submerged lands on the Outer Continental Shelf to produce oil. We pointed out that there was no reason to limit the liability of those facilities. That the Secretary of Interior had the power to impose any limitations that he sees fit, including, but not limited to, absolute liability and responsibility for the full payment of clean-up costs in case of a spill. With the change from the Johnson administration to the Nixon administration the change in regulations took place so that oil companies engaged in offshore drilling under lease by the U.S. Government were made so liable and so responsible.

If we had accepted the Senate version then these wells including that responsible for the spill in Louisiana would have been liable for not more than $5 million worth of damage. I do not know but I believe that the instances of Santa Barbara and the recent spill on the gulf off Louisiana may have resulted in a change of position upon the part of the other body. Insofar as onshore facilities or offshore facilities, which are within State jurisdiction, our investigation showed that $8 million was a reasonable limitation of liability. But it should be borne in mind that this limitation of liability is solely for cleanup costs by the United States and does not proport to limit liability that might be imposed by State law or that exists under common law. Comparing then our position of today with the position that would have resulted if this body agreed in 1968 to the arbitrary limits inserted in the Senate bill, the wisdom or action at that time is magnified and confirmed. Similarly, in the area of vessel pollution, we have been able to derive a formula that is better than the 1968 bill, that is better than the Senate version of H.R. 4148, and indeed is better than the House version of H.R. 4148. In this, I feel particularly proud that as a member of the conference committee, I was able to bring directly to the attention of the conferees the benefits of lessons learned from the deplorable incident that took place in Tampa Bay when the Greek tanker, the Delian Appolon, spilled oil into our waters and upon our beaches. Directly as a result of this spill, I proposed several amendments, most of which were accepted—one of which was not.

The Delian Appolon spill demonstrated that our resources have not been gathered together for the prevention of damage when a spill does occur. It highlighted the lack of an effective contingency plan and led me to believe that whatever plan did exist was nothing more than a paper exercise, now outdated and of little practical use. As a result, my amendment which was adopted requires the President to develop a national contingency plan within 60 days. This plan provides for a complete guide to what should be done in case of oil spills and what should be on hand to minimize damage from oil spills, contain them and clean up the oil from our waters, our shorelines, and our beaches. It provides for a designation of a strike force to go in immediately and stop the damage wherever it can. It provides for designation for equipment that should be kept on hand recognizing that this equipment will vary from location to location. Further, it requires a schedule of the waters of this country to indicate which of them can safely be subjected to chemical treatment of oil spills for the purpose of disbursing or making more sinkable the oil and which cannot. The schedule will also make quite clear what limits and which disbursants may be used. In case of doubt, the schedule, of course, may need to provide that the wisdom of an on-the-scene expert to be designated by the President must be drawn upon before which such chemicals can be used. The important thing is that the on-the-scene people will know which chemicals can be used, which cannot, and which waters would be so deleteriously affected by chemical treatment that the protection of the ecology demanded that such treatment would not be used.

Strange as it may seem, Mr. Speaker, after all our experience with oil spills very little is known about the theory of containment of oil spills and very few really effective devices have been developed. I am happy to see that there is some private research being conducted in this area and I think those that are doing it should be complimented for it. However, I feel that this is an area in which leadership should be exercised by the United States and, consequently, have offered an amendment which the conferees accepted. It would require research by the United States or its designee for the development of containment devices and procedures.

The Tampa Bay oil spill, caused by a vessel which just a few days earlier had polluted the waters of Port Everglades, Fla., and which may indeed have been involved in another spill just a few days after the Tampa incident, illustrated the need for inspection of vessels as a means of prevention of oil spills. The conferees accepted my amendment which provided for this inspection of vessels and cargo. I regret to say that they did not accept the portion of this amendment—which, incidently, as were the other amendments offered in this regard approved by the administration—was not accepted. This would have permitted samples to be taken from oil cargos so that in case of spills identification could be made from the spill material as to its source. I feel that it is unfortunate that this provision was stricken and hope that perhaps in the future we can revise the statute to include such a provision provided, of course, that the Secretary of Interior or the Secretary of the Department in which the Coast Guard is operating does not have that authority under some other law.

There are three examples as just stated whereby what came to pass was better than what might have been if the United States had accepted the Senate's amendments in 1968.

In the area of pollution by oil spills from vessels, I might say that the conference substitute is better than either the House bill or the Senate bill. As the Members of this body will recall, the position of this body was that limitations of liability and imposition of liability should not be such as to preclude the possibility of recovery of clean-up costs from the discharger. We felt that the guage of this liability should be whether or not insurance could be obtained to cover these events. Consequently, the House bill provided for limitations of liability for vessels based upon an evaluation of the world insurance market for this new type of risk. The Senate position was based upon figures for which we could find no substantiation in their hearings and which we were assured were completely uninsurable.

Both Houses recognized the difficulty of proving fault as the basis of recovery. The House solved this problem by providing for reversal of burden of proof while the Senate came to the same result by defining liability not based upon fault.

The conference was able to work out a compromise accepting the best features of both the House and the Senate positions. We arrived at a limitation of liability based on what we call strict liability. That is, regardless of fault and with certain very limited exceptions the discharger of oil will be liable. His limitation of liability would be $100 per gross ton or $14 million, whichever is higher. This figure incidentally is twice the amount paid in the Torrey Canyon case. In the case of cleanup necessitated as a result of a willful spill or of a negligent spill, the benefits of limitations of liability would be removed and where the privity and knowledge of the owner of the vessel was involved he would be required to pay the full costs for cleanup.

This position is stronger than the original Senate position because it is workable and is insurable. It is stronger than the original House position because it covers more situations where spills do damage. Indeed, it is even stronger than the proposed convention drafted by the International Maritime Consultive Organization—IMCO—which was drafted last November and signed by the United States. That convention, replete with legal devices by which the discharger could forestall payment, provides a total liability to third parties as well as for cleanup costs of $124 per ton. Our position limits liability only in the matter of cleanup costs to be returned to the U.S. Government at $100. If there are charges that another government would wish to make, say in the case of a spill that involved both the United States and Canada, or if there are charges or damages due to third parties under admiralty law or common law, these would be in addition and would not be subject to our limitation of liability.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one point I wish to emphasize to this body is that the American public has been deceived, perhaps unwittingly, primarily by press reports which have appeared purporting to describe the effects of this bill. They say that it would charge the oil companies for cleanup. In the case of discharges from vessels other than those owned by oil companies—and this, I understand, is usually the case—there would be no charge to the oil company at all. The entire charge would be against the ship or the owner of the vessel.

This appeared to me to be inequitable. After all, if the cargo is such as to require higher cleanup costs because of its nature—for example a bunker "C" oil which is thick and sticky—it would seem reasonable that the oil company should pay the cost. I, therefore, offered an amendment to the conference which would have made the cargo of oil as well as the ship liable for oil spills. It is unfortunate that the conferees saw fit not to accept my proposal. I think it would have had a salutary effect upon the choice of vessels made by oil companies choosing to ship their cargoes by waters.

It seems that oil cargoes despite the hazard they pose to our beaches and waters were very difficult to touch. The conferees refused to agree to make the oil cargo liable for the damage they caused, they refused to permit samples of the cargo to be taken, and removed a provision in the House bill which would make the expense of removing a vessel which poses a substantial threat of a pollution hazard chargeable against the cargo of the vessel as well as the vessel itself even though this has been done against a dangerous chlorine cargo when it threatened the Mississippi area. So that in three instances where it would have been possible to charge the oil companies rather than the vessels the conference refused to do it. I wish to make it clear, however, that my personal view was not in agreement with the result of the conference report in that area. I wish to make it equally clear, however, that aside from those provisions I believe that the conference has come up with the best possible solution at this time to the oil pollution question. I feel gratified that the conferees so readily accepted the amendments I proposed following the Tampa Bay incident.

Another amendment the conferees accepted, which came to pass as a result of the Tampa Bay spill, dealt with that of notice. Both Houses required that immediate notice be given in case of a spill by the person in charge of a vessel or of an onshore or offshore facility as soon as he has knowledge of any discharge of oil. Both Houses considered it proper that this should be a criminal penalty for we could imagine no more vile conduct than that of a person knowingly refusing to report an oil spill which could cause so much damage if left unattended, but which hopefully, if notice were given in time, would result in mitigation and containment of that damage. So I emphasize that this is a criminal penalty. Such a person, if arrested, will be put through the same procedures that any other person suspected of committing a Federal crime would be put through. As a result of the Tampa Bay experience, the conferees concluded that a stiff penalty of a $10,000 fine or a year in jail or both would be imposed. This is twice the fine heretofore considered.

In all these regards relating to oil spill control and prevention, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that we have benefited by the experiences that have befallen us. It is unfortunate that we did not have those provisions of the 1968 legislation in effect that would have provided for Federal cleanup in the case of the oil spills we have suffered, but this provision as well as many other beneficial provisions died when the other body refused then to see the wisdom or point of view at that time—a point of view which they now accept and have adopted.

However, illustrating the wisdom of the poet's words, I would like to invite the attention of this body to the sad "it might have been" if the 1968 bill had not been permitted by the Senate to die without final action. That bill would have provided an alternate means of financing the construction costs of sewage treatment plants. If it had passed, I doubt whether it would have been necessary now for the President to request legislation which is essentially similar to that which passed both Houses of Congress in 1968. Indeed, the contract authority that it would have provided for the construction of sewage treatment plants would have been in use and would have resulted in construction of sewage treatment facilities based upon a Federal participation of $1 billion for this fiscal year. Mr. Speaker, "it might have been."

Whether the 1968 act passed or not at least one portion of the new legislation would have been necessary. I point to this with particular pride because I introduced it into the House. The Committee on Public Works adopted it without change and the conference committee also accepted this provision as I have written it and that is the training provisions. Recognizing that water treatment and waste water treatment whether from human or industrial or agricultural or any other source of waste cannot be accomplished unless we have a trained cadre of qualified personnel from the operating and maintenance level on up through the postgraduate levels, I introduced a bill that would make it possible for many people who cannot now afford to undertake the studies necessary for training themselves in the water quality control field to do so. Without this training, no matter how much money we authorize, no matter how much money we appropriate, we will not—and I repeat this for emphasis—we will not be able to clean up the waters. We must have trained personnel, and this provision of the new bill does this. As I say, Mr. Speaker, I am very proud of it.

There are many other areas of this bill which are an improvement over the 1968 version. We have the provision resulting from the floor amendment of my good friend from Ohio providing for pollution control in the Great Lakes. We have taken into account as a result of a Senate floor amendment the unhappy and insanitary conditions resulting from the lack of proper water supply and sewage disposal facilities among the native villages of Alaska. We have what I believe to be a workable version of the certification provisions which would require an applicant for a Federal license to receive a certification from the States that the activity for which the application is made would not violate water quality standards.

As the Members will recall, this certification provision originally appeared very late in 1968 before there was any real chance of studying it.

There has been opportunity to study this matter and I believe that the provisions now contained are reasonable, workable, and will result in protection to our water environment without crippling our progress.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I believe that Congress has made good use of the time necessitated by the delay brought about when S. 3206 was left high and dry at the end of the 90th Congress. There are some things that we would have benefited by if the other body had been as perceptive as the Members of this body. Nevertheless, there is little use crying over spilled milk and I believe rather than doing so we are in a position to be proud of the work that has resulted in H.R. 4148, the Water Quality Improvement Act of 1970.

Mr. HARSHA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLATNIK. I yield to the very distinguished member of the conference, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HARSHA).

Mr. HARSHA. Mr. Speaker, the conference report before us on the Water Quality Improvement Act of 1970 is the result of many months of effort upon the part of the Members of both Houses and their staffs. It deals with a wide variety of subjects, each of which is intensely complicated in its own right.

In each case, the area was explored to the fullest. Experts on all sides were consulted and their views given the weight they merit. The position of the conferees on each subject indeed on each sentence and on every word was carefully considered in the light of the evidence that we had before us.

For example, the oil pollution provisions were extremely difficult to resolve because they affected directly our merchant marine, concepts of admiralty law, the American insurance market, the overseas insurance market, the balance of payments, our international relations, the economy, small business, onshore and offshore oil facilities, research provisions, vessel inspection requirements, requirements that vessels will carry oil spill containment equipment as well as the predominant consideration of the protection of our ecology. It was only after diligent effort that these difficulties were resolved and that agreement to the conference report by the conferees was reached. Incidentally, I should like to invite the attention of the House to an error that appears on page 31 of the conference report. The first word of the second line as printed is "submarginal." That word should be "submerged" so that the phrase reads "Submerged Lands Act of 1953."

This report has been in conference since October. Some believe that the length of time spent on it was due to lack of agreement among the conferees. This view could only be supported by those unfamiliar with the wide range of the bill's content.

In the area of vessel pollution, we provided the first Federal water quality legislation to affect vessel owners directly and which will result eventually in Federal standards applicable to all vessels to control the discharge of human wastes from them. It also will preempt State laws and regulations in the future and create uniformity between the States so that vessels will be able to pass from one State to another unhindered while at the same time preventing any discharge of untreated or inadequately treated sewage into those waters. In this area, Mr. Speaker, the questions of vessel construction, of small boat use of availability of shore base facilities for servicing of all vessels, availability of marine sanitation equipment, the condition of the waterways of the Nation, and specialized State laws and requirements had to be studied and considered with care.

Another area of great complexity is that covered by section 21—certification by the States to Federal agencies in cases where application has been made for Federal licenses or permits. That certification must come from the States unless, of course, the waters involved are under the direct supervision of the Federal Government or there is no State certifying authority. In those cases, the Secretary of Interior will be the certifying authority. In order to evaluate this law properly, every area of Federal licensing and permit procedure had to be examined to determine its special problems and to eliminate the possibility of overlooking important considerations in any specific area. It is under this provision that the questions of control of potential effects of heat discharged into the waters through heated effluents are dealt with. The complexities of that question are well known to the Members of this body. At the other end of the spectrum came permits such as those required for the building of small outfalls which present minimal potential for pollution, but nevertheless, must be considered.

In that same section 21, we reenforce by statute previously expressed Presidential policy to control water pollution by requiring compliance with quality standards by Federal facilities.

Another area that was investigated thoroughly by the conference committee was that of how properly to recognize industrial organizations and political subdivisions which have demonstrated outstanding technological achievement in waste treatment and pollution abatement programs while assuring such recognition could not be abused.

We evaluated once again the very complicated area of training of personnel of all types for the operating of waste treatment plants as well for their design and research for new methods to solve our water quality problems.

We dealt with the complex problem of the staffing to be provided to support the Council on Environmental Quality and investigated the type and quantity of personnel that they would need to be effective.

The question of the control of hazardous polluting substances other than oil led us to an exploration of the manufacturing industry of the United States, including the process industries and chemical industries. We thus provided for designation of such substances after suitable determination and investigation by the President.

The question of area acid and mine water pollution control demonstrations brought us into another field of American life and technology.

Along with this, the dictates of humanity required us to consider the plight of the native villages of Alaska, which because of their peculiar position find themselves with no adequate water supplies and no means of preventing pollution of their waters. This, too, is an area that was explored with great care.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize the very complex, wide ranged, and indeed the innovative concepts that we have dealt with here. I believe it to be an excellent piece of legislation. I am convinced that what we put into this bill is necessary and wise. I am also convinced that what we did not put in it this time should not be there at this time. Consequently, I take pride in urging the House of Representatives to adopt the conference report as reported on H.R. 4148, the Water Quality Improvement Act of 1970.

One Member of this body I believe deserves special praise for the work that he has done on this bill. The ranking minority member of the Public Works Committee, the gentleman from St. Petersburg, Fla., Mr. WILLIAM C. CRAMER, has over the period of the last several years devoted much of his time and effort to the question of resolving difficulties in water pollution legislation and developing practicable working solutions to our pollution problems. He has continuously been a leader in the area of water pollution control legislation. As a result, the law is replete with his innovations introduced either as bills or as amendments to legislation that this body has considered or is considering now. These include such items as provisions for the training of personnel for water pollution control, the financing of construction of municipal waste plants, the national contingency plan for the control of oil spills, strong penalties for failure to notify of spills, inspection, and prevention requirements to permit inspection of vessels carrying oil, the development of a strike force to deal with oil spills, provision for research for the containment of oil following a spill, research and study provisions for control and amelioration of damage caused by spills and many other areas in which his knowledge, experience, and expertise on matters dealing with water pollution have proven themselves so valuable to this committee.

Unfortunately, BILL CRAMER could not be here today. I have been in constant contact with him and have kept him apprised of the progress of this conference report. He is standing by in case any problems should arise. I assured him that we foresaw no problems in the passage of this conference report for I could imagine that there would be no problem in the House just as there was no problem in the other body. BILL CRAMER has voted for water pollution control legislation for many, many years. He voted on the original passage of this bill and was a leader for tough but workable provisions in the conference. In 1968, he twice voted for the passage of similar legislation so that his record on water pollution matters is intact. However, I feel that it is incumbent upon us to give recognition to a Member whose contribution in this field has been so great and to remind ourselves that even though he physically is not present today, his guiding hand and incisive reasoning pervades the legislation that we are considering, and I would take the liberty of reminding the Members of this body that he was indeed an active conferee, that he signed the conference report and approves and supports its provisions.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLATNIK. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend our conferees for their diligent efforts in producing this comprehensive measure toward insuring the quality of our navigable waters. This piece of legislation represents an enormous investment of effort and time by those who have labored so hard over the past several months.

Though I support the underlying objectives of this bill, I am concerned by the tremendous potentials for delay which are inherent in the complicated system for State and Federal approvals embodied in section 21 of the bill—delays which can have many adverse effects in satisfying important needs of this country. Additionally, and without intending to fault the conferees in connection with weaknesses in some of the rather elaborate details, I detect several features which seem to me to leave something to be desired.

For example, in section 21(b) of the bill the language in subsection (2), pertaining to the objections of a State other than the State in which the discharge in point would take place, employs the key clause "to insure compliance with applicable water standards," whereas, elsewhere in the section the pivotal clause is more accurately worded in terms of "reasonable assurance—that such activity will be conducted in a manner which will not violate applicable water standards." Presumably the intention in subsection (2) is to insure that there is "reasonable assurance."

Also, in subsection (2) of section 21 (b) it is not clear what the scope of the licensing agency's judgment is intended to be, particularly in cases where the State in which the discharge would occur is satisfied on the basis of reasonable standards but another State that may be affected is not satisfied and wishes to impose unreasonably restrictive standards.

I am troubled, too, by the uncertainty which the bill creates in regard to facilities presently in operation in States that now have water quality standards.

Another potentially serious problem may be lurking in the provisions of subsection (b) (9) (B) of section 21, which apparently would enable a State that has no water quality standards at the time of construction and operation of a facility covered by the act to thereafter adopt water quality standards that would be impossible for an existing facility to meet. I am concerned that there may not be sufficient flexibility and practicality built into some of these features of the bill.

I shall vote for this bill notwithstanding my concerns.

Mr. Speaker, I might add that the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy has under consideration bills which would also permit States to establish radiological standards more restrictive than those of the Atomic Energy Commission.

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. ALBERT).

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the gentleman from Minnesota yielding this time to me, because I think that the Water Quality Improvement Act of 1970, to which the House is about to give final approval, is not only a landmark piece of legislation but is another outstanding example of congressional initiative.

I feel humble in this area in following the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. BLATNIK).

I think we might point out here that in this bill, as in practically every other major field, comments in many quarters to the contrary notwithstanding, it has been the Congress rather than the executive branch of the Government which has moved ahead in a vital area of high national priority. This water pollution control legislation was first introduced, this particular bill, by the distinguished gentleman from Maryland (Mr. FALLON) the chairman of the House Committee on Public Works, as early as January 23, 1969. Public hearings opened in February, but the Department of the Interior was not prepared to present the administration's position until March. The legislative product which the House Public Works Committee has fashioned in executive session was almost exclusively, insofar as policy is concerned, the product of its own labors. The administration's contribution was minimal. Drawn on heavily was the wealth of experience acquired by the committee during the past decade in pioneering in the water pollution control field.

I would remind the House that as long ago as 1960, the 86th Congress passed an antiwater pollution bill which was vetoed by President Eisenhower. Not content to rely solely on the wealth of background material it had already possessed, however, the Committee on Public Works of the House of Representatives in 1969 proceeded to gather additional evidence both in Washington and in the field.

Visited and viewed firsthand, for example, was the Santa Barbara oil slick. I cannot emphasize too strongly that much more was involved here than merely physically inspecting the results of this unfortunate disaster. Rather, what is of prime importance is that the long immersion of the members of the Committee on Public Works, particularly the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. BLATNIK) in this subject has equipped that committee with a sophisticated knowledge of what these problems mean both as to short- and long-range effects and how they can be dealt with on a practical basis and what the interrelationship may be between various water pollution problems.

To my knowledge no important official in the executive branch of the government could possibly possess this type of expert knowledge.

H.R. 4148 passed the House on April 16, 1969, and the other body last October. The final legislative product which we now have before us is the result of a long and arduous conference extending over weeks and months. The same expertise which was so vital in the drafting of the original House-passed measure has made possible a successful conclusion of the conference.

H.R. 4148 is truly a monumental measure. I extend my congratulations to the membership of the Committee on Public Works for a job well done. I am sure they will not object to my singling out for particular commendation my old friend, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. BLATNIK).

Fifteen years ago JOHN BLATNIK was warning the Nation and the Congress about water pollution. His was often almost a voice crying in the wilderness. He received no cooperation from the Eisenhower administration. As I said earlier, his antiwater pollution bill in 1960 was vetoed. His dogged efforts were finally crowned with success in 1961 with the enactment of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act. This legislation was further expanded in 1966. The passage of H.R. 4148 today represents yet another triumph for JOHN BLATNIK in the fight against water pollution. He was of course supported in this effort by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Public Works (Mr. FALLON) and all other Members on both sides of the aisle. This was a great triumph; however, it is the climax of great effort on the part of JOHN BLATNIK. I am sure it will not be his last major effort in this very important area in this House, or in this Congress.

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished minority leader, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. GERALD R. FORD).

Mr. GERALD R. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply grateful for the allocation of time from the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Public Works.

Let me speak out most emphatically in complimenting the members of the Committee on Public Works for sending to the House for action a conference report that I believe is a very broad-based and very constructive piece of pollution control legislation.

The House of Representatives through its Committee on Public Works has been in the forefront from the inception of the battle by the Federal Government against the problems of water pollution. The history recounted by the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. ALBERT) is, I believe, accurate in indicating that men like the gentleman from Minnesota, JOHN BLATNIK, deserve a great deal of credit. I would, however, add the name of one of the Members on this side of the aisle who I believe should also be recognized for his outstanding service in the Federal battle against the problems of water pollution. He is the gentleman from Florida (Mr. CRAMER), who has been, as far as I know, one of the persons in the Congress who has pushed the hardest and the most to get necessary legislation so that we could do something effectively in the field of water pollution.

Now I would like to make one observation in addition to complimenting all of the members of the Committee on Public Works on both sides of the aisle.

The gentleman from Oklahoma mentioned something to the effect that there had been a very bad oil pollution problem that developed in the Santa Barbara Channel or harbor in 1969.

If my memory is accurate, that problem arose in the last few days of January 1969. It was tragic. It was serious. Unfortunately, the tragedy that developed took place under the regulations promulgated by the previous Secretary of the Interior, the distinguished Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Udall, who served from January 21, 1961 to January 20, 1969. The regulations, we found, were inadequate. Mr. Udall apparently did not have tight enough regulations to preclude the kind of oil pollution problem that developed in the Santa Barbara Channel.

I am delighted that the Secretary of the Interior under the present administration, Mr. Hickel, has done something to remedy that problem. I am told that the new, corrective regulations which are tighter, more restrictive and more constructive have been issued by Secretary Hickel as of August 1969. I am simply saying that the Nixon administration, when it found the inadequacies of the regulations under the former Secretary of the Interior Stewart Udall, have done something to correct the problem. The new regulations will do a better job—although such regulations cannot in and of themselves prevent the kind of problem that on occasion may arise regardless of the best of intentions.

Now let me add this. This legislation I do not think is the final answer to the problems of pollution. The President has submitted to the Congress a number of bills, four of which involve the Committee on Public Works, in the area of water pollution. These bills, I am certain will get the prompt and constructive consideration of the Committee on Public Works under the chairman, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. FALLON), and from the subcommittee under the chairmanship of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. BLATNIK). They are proposals that should be enacted into law. They will add to and supplement the current basic legislation. I hope and trust that within a relatively short period of time the President's new and comprehensive recommendations for clean water, for clean air, and for open spaces, will get the approval of this House. It should not be a partisan issue. It has not been in the past and it should not be a partisan issue in the future. This Congress can make a name for itself, in partnership with this administration, if we act affirmatively on the new legislative package recommended by President Nixon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCEWEN).

Mr. MCEWEN. Mr. Speaker, the question I would like to propose to my dear friend and colleague, the gentleman from Texas, who has given some consideration to this is—what the meaning of the term "navigable waters of the United States" is as it particularly applies in this bill, to preempting of standards for the reguation of discharge and treatment of sewage from vessels.

Mr. Speaker, the committees of both Houses—the Committees on Public Works—recognized there was a problem and it was forcefully brought to our attention by recreational boaters. They do not want to face a multiplicity of regulation as they transit interstate waters, from one jurisdiction to another.

I think we will agree that was the primary reason behind the preemption here by the Federal Government, as proposed in this legislation, setting standards.

What I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas is this. Is it his view that in this preemption we are also preempting for Federal standards wholly intrastate waters—a lake, shall we say, wholly contained within one State—that here, too, Federal standards shall apply?

Mr. WRIGHT. Of course the term "navigable waters" has been subject to many different interpretations. I believe the intention of the conference committee in this instance was to define "navigable waters of the United States" as those waters which have legally been so defined and those waters which are, in effect, navigable waters, and those, primarily, of course, are interstate streams.

The purpose of preemption of marine safety device and sanitary device standards by the Federal agency was, if I correctly understand it, to assure that boaters engaging their recreational craft in the use of the navigable waters of the United States would not confront a proliferation of differing standards as they travel from one State jurisdiction to another.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. FEIGHAN) such time as he may consume.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the members of the conference committee and members of the House Committee on Public Works for their efforts in bringing to the floor of this House this report on the legislation which is of major importance in the control and cleanup of our national waters.

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK).

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, I want to express my appreciation to the members of the Public Works Committee and to the House conferees for retaining the $20 million authorization for the special pollution problems of the Great Lakes.

I also want to point out that in the committee action to date and the recent recommendations of the President failed to provide any funding for the removal of any residual pollution which continues to contaminate the waters of the Great Lakes.

I hope that the committee will this year consider legislation to approach the special problems of pollution disaster areas such as Lake Erie, the Hudson River, San Francisco Bay, and certain portions of the gulf seaboard. Efforts must be made to meet such problems by increasing a water flow, developing wave action, and in the case of Lake Erie, by dredging or aerating certain areas of densely polluted waters. These pollution disaster areas are beyond the capacity of any State or local community and can only be handled through Federal action.

I hope to urge such a program before the Public Works Committee at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. JACOBS).

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, I was interested in what the minority leader had to say about the comparative performance of the previous administration and the present administration in water pollution control. I would direct the attention of the minority leader to the fact that the Commissioner of Water Pollution Control, one David Dominick, appointed by the current administration on January 5 of this year, sent out simultaneous letters to a number of career regional directors of this program in effect firing them, because of ordering them transferred. And, at least in one instance, in Chicago, Ill., the current administration nominee to replace a 20-year career public servant is a civil engineer without special qualifications who was chairman of "Lithuanians for Nixon" in 1968. I just say that for the edification of the minority leader.

Mr. GERALD R. FORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. GERALD R. FORD. The gentleman's comments, however, do not deny the statement that I made earlier, that the oil slick problem in the Santa Barbara Channel took place under regulations promulgated by former Secretary of Interior, the Honorable Stewart Udall.

Mr. JACOBS. No, I do not; and I am sure the gentleman would not deny the fact that the oil spill which occurred in the Gulf of Mexico just 2 weeks ago occurred under regulations that exist now, and also regulations which, I am told, have not been properly enforced in the case of that well.

Mr. GERALD R. FORD. The original exemption or license was granted in that case by the previous Democratic administration, however.

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. KEITH).

Mr. KEITH. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment the chairman of the committee and its members on their efforts to bring the final version of this important bill back to us for a vote. As the committee knows, I have been very much interested both in the problem of oil spills at sea and in territorial waters. With reference to the efforts of this administration versus earlier administrations, I would say that before 1969 there was a lack of direction insofar as the responsibility for cleanups was concerned. This legislation, I believe, firmly puts this responsibility on the shoulders of the Coast Guard, for the first time makes substantial sums of money available for oil spillage removal and delineates the responsibility of industry in the cleanup problem.

Now that this has been assigned, we can actually make some progress, but we should have done it many years ago. The House tried to do it, if I recall correctly, 2 years ago. We passed a bill in the closing hours of the session in 1968, but it died between the branches of Congress and so the fault does not lie with this administration but with earlier administrations at least insofar as the assignment of actual responsibility to the industry and to the branches of Government that have to cope with this problem.

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, this legislation comes not a minute too soon. In the last 2 years we have had a thousand oil spills which have tremendously damaged this ecology of America. Hopefully in the future through this legislation we will have found a way to cope with these problems, and at least cut down on the damage that would otherwise have continued to decimate our shoreline.

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER).

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the chairman yielding to me.

I commend the House Committee on Public Works and the conference committee for the new subsection H of section 5 of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act which has been incorporated in the final version of H.R. 4148.

I am very pleased that this body has given recognition to the problems of eutrophication and lake pollution.

In fact, this provision will, for the first time, give authority directly to the Department of the Interior to carry on research and demonstration projects, including the construction of publicly owned research facilities, which will give us additional information on the problem of eutrophication and the ending of pollution in our inland lakes.

Mr. Speaker, I compliment the committee on its work and look forward to having the Department of the Interior implement this "clean lakes" section of the legislation at an early date.

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK).

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I, too, commend the committee, and I thank the chairman for having yielded to me.

Mr. Speaker, I direct one question to the gentleman from Texas regarding the matter of the discharge of waste from pleasure craft. I know there is some controversy on this subject, and there is a great deal of concern by pleasure craft owners about it in my area as to what regulations will be adopted.

Can the gentleman from Texas give us any information as to what procedures will be followed in settling this controversial question?

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the bill does not lay down the guidelines but directs the Secretary of the Interior within 2 years to promulgate standards for these marine sanitation devices. Then it directs the Coast Guard to develop regulations for installation of the devices to see that they live up to the standards.

The bill exempts from these standards and regulations the vessels which already are equipped with sanitation devices that were installed pursuant to existing State law, so long as they remain consistent with existing State law. It provides that, after 2 years, new vessels would be required to comply with these standards and regulations. Existing vessels, however, would have 5 years before they have to come into compliance.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman. It seems a reasonable approach to this problem. Then those who have some controversy about this problem will have to sell their case to the authorities making those regulations.

(Mr. JONES of Alabama (at the request of Mr. FALLON) was granted permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I am particularly pleased to have had the opportunity to be a part in bringing this conference report to the House today.

The conferees have worked long and hard to prepare this legislation which meets such a great need in our country.

This is a giant step forward and one which every Member of this House can be proud.

Since the first Water Pollution Control Act in 1948 I have worked with my distinguished and knowledgeable colleague from Minnesota, Hon. JOHN BLATNIK, to provide the most adequate legislation possible for control of water pollution.

We were able to extend the original act in 1953 and make it permanent in 1956. This initiated the grants for construction of municipal water treatment works.

Concern for quality of our environment was not so strong at that time.

In 1955 and 1956, public apathy was most obvious to me as chairman of the special subcommittee which traveled back and forth across the country conducting hearings on the Nation's water resource problems. Only in the urban centers were the warnings of growing pollution problems given voice.

During the early 1960's another series of hearings throughout the country before the Natural Resources and Power Subcommittee of which I was chairman, focused particular attention on the water pollution problems which were multiplying at an alarming rate.

The improvements of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act in 1961, 1965, and 1966 reflected the rising tide of public concern and interest in preventing the death of our lakes and streams.

It is in response to a great need and demand by the people of this country that we bring this conference report to the House for adoption today. This legislation will be an accommodation to the people who are earnestly seeking to make corrections and improvements in the quality of the water they use and discharge.

I believe that H.R. 4148 is another fine piece of legislation which has been reported from the Committee on Public Works, and which has already passed this body and is now before you today for final approval of the conference report. This bill is one of the outstanding pieces of legislation in which I have played a part in during my tenure with the Congress.

H.R. 4148 moves us into new categories in the drive to keep our Nation's waters pure. It establishes liability, monetary limitations, and requirements for oil cleanup spillage, whether it be by a vessel or onshore or offshore installation. It moves into the category of pollution from various types of vessels and lays down the guidelines for the development of appropriate disposal of sewage from those vessels in the years ahead. It requires for the first time certifications from any industry or from anyone who would use our Nation's waters for purposes such as nuclear power development, steel plant development, bridge construction, among other things that in the use of such Nation's waters the operation of any of these facilities will not effect the water quality standards of a State or States.

It covers many other major points too long to be enumerated here in the short time that I have. Suffice it to say I believe this legislation will prove to be one of the most important pieces of legislation this Congress will pass in this or any other session, and I recommend adoption of the conference report on H.R. 4148.

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to have been a part in development of the legislation which is pending before this body today for final consideration before it will be sent to the White House for signature.

This is major legislation with a capital "M."

Throughout the years from the Committee on Public Works there has been reported legislation which has developed a stronger and stronger program to keep our Nation's waters clean. This body throughout the years has consistently supported legislation which will provide necessary funding to develop proper means of cleaning up our Nation's waters and when necessary it has provided a means by which the Federal Government and the States have the power to bring action against those who would violate the water quality standards or our Nation's rivers, lakes, streams, and oceans.

The legislation pending before this body is another giant step in an effort to accomplish the goal we all seek—clean water for the use of all Americans. It is a long and complex bill. It covers such diverse fields as control of pollution by oil; control of hazardous polluting substances; control of sewage from vessels; and a requirement that proper certification be received from those who would use our Nation's waters and in the process must obtain a Federal license or permit, that they give reasonable assurance of compliance with water quality standards for a State or States before that applicant can receive any license or permit. This includes among others a license from the Atomic Energy Commission for a nuclear powerplant or for any new dam which requires a license or from the Federal Power Commission, as well as many other industries which would require a permit to build a dock discharge pipe, a water intake pipe, or a bridge.

These are just some of the highlights of this fine legislation. It is the result of almost 2½ years of intensive work by the Congress and comes to you today as a result of one of the most fully discussed and lengthy conferences in the history of the Committee on Public Works.

I am proud to be a part of it and I support it.

May I conclude my remarks by commending all those on the conference who worked so hard for the legislation, in particular the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. BLATNIK), the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. JONES), the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT), the ranking member of the committee, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. CRAMER), the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. HARSHA), and the gentleman from New York (Mr. GROVER).

I urge adoption of the conference report.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, let me say that I myself have been a strong supporter over many years of all the legislation that the Committee on Public Works has reported in the field of water pollution. I am particularly grateful for the fact that this conference report contains language which I supported when H.R. 4148 was first considered by the House. I have reference to section 15 of the conference report dealing with pollution control in the Great Lakes. This is an opening for the Secretary to begin to develop projects, to find new methods and techniques to eliminate or control pollution in all portions of the watersheds of the Great Lakes.

I note that the figure of $20 million for this section is still retained in the conference report and I appreciate this as well. I am pleased that elsewhere in this legislation which is before us today there is also authorization for clean lakes study and their research. I am appreciative of all these steps but I might add that they are only a beginning.

The problem in Lake Erie and in the other Great Lakes and in many portions of the waters of this country is a pressing one.

Under the $20 million authorized for this Great Lakes program the pilot project of the program would be one dealing with Lake Erie itself. The problem in Lake Erie has been most pressing for a number of years and therefore the first attention and the first priority for this program will be given to Lake Erie.

We must move forward faster in this field and I intend to do all I can to see that this effort is made to finally clean up this problem. I believe the balance of the legislation covering such things as oil pollution, licensing of facilities who use our Nation's waters, vessel pollution, are major steps in the advancement of the pollution cleanup of our Nation.

I support the conference report.

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, I most earnestly urge my colleagues to speedily and overwhelmingly approve this conference report on H.R. 4148, the Water Quality Improvement Act of 1970.

Beyond the extension of the present water pollution control legislation, this report recommends the acceptance and inclusion of the substance of a measure, H.R. 9382, that I cosponsored in March last year, and the legislative proposal I supported last September to create a Council on Environmental Quality.

That act is implemented in this measure by providing for the further establishment of the Office of Environmental Quality, to provide technical advice and assistance that will enable the President, the Congress, States, and municipalities to better meet and overcome our environmental pollution dangers.

Other additional major provisions recommended in this report are those authorizing an accelerated study of the removal methods and enforcement measures designed to deal with releases of hazardous substances into the waters of the United States; requiring that all Federal facilities and activities, as well as those federally licensed or permitted facilities and activities, must comply with certain water quality standards; projecting a clearer policy, in the protection of the public interest, of complete liability upon owners and operators of vessels and onshore and offshore facilities for pollution cleanup costs incurred by the United States.

Mr. Speaker, these and other additions to existing water pollution control legislation, contained in this report, represent a vigorous forward step in our continuing efforts to recruit all the resources of our Government and our society to expedite the removal and control of the increasingly dangerous pollution of our waters.

They constitute a commendable legislative effort on the part of the Congress to join with the President in moving faster and more effectively toward the completion of what we might well call a great national house-cleaning project that is absolutely essential for our survival.

Of course, many of us here who joined in urging the approval of the originally proposed appropriation of $1 billion for the construction of sewage and waste treatment facilities are mindful that our cause was lost by two votes. I sincerely hope that, when the time comes for the House to approve the actual appropriations necessary to carry out the provisions of this legislation, the same spirit of urgency and priority will be present as is being demonstrated here today.

Let us remember that most small towns, particularly, and our cities and States have practically reached the end of their financial resources and overburdened taxpayers, in these inflationary days, cannot bear the additional burden of cleaning up local and State waters. All our good intentions and our best legislative projections will come to nothing unless sufficient money is recommended by the President and appropriated by the Congress to fulfill the purpose of this act, and to honor our commitment to the taxpayers of the United States to provide them with a wholesome environment, free from pollution and poison.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, I want to express my appreciation to the members of the Public Works Committee and to the House conferees for retaining the $20 million authorization for the special pollution problems of the Great Lakes.

I also want to point out that in the committee action to date and the recent recommendations of the President failed to provide any funding for the removal of any residual pollution which continues to contaminate the waters of the Great Lakes.

It is my hope that the committee will this year consider legislation to approach the special problems of pollution disaster areas such as Lake Erie, the Hudson River, San Francisco Bay, and certain portions of the gulf seaboard. Efforts must be made to meet such problems by increasing water flow, developing currents and wave action, and in the case of Lake Erie, by dredging or aerating certain areas of densely polluted waters. These pollution disaster areas are beyond the capacity of any state or local community and can only be handled through Federal action.

I expect to urge such a program before the Public Works Committee at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, the Water Quality Improvement Act—H.R. 4148, now reported out of conference after lengthy debate—is a significant step forward toward restoring and improving the quality of our Nation's waters. Initiated in the wake of the disastrous Torrey Canyon incident in 1967, and spurred by the Santa Barbara blowout and the Ocean Eagle spill in San Juan Harbor, this landmark legislation finally passed through the committees of both houses and was sent into conference committee last session. While the differences were being worked out, a series of disasters took place which prodded completion of the bill—a tanker grounded and leaking off the coast of Nova Scotia, one spilling its cargo into Tampa Bay, and the oil spillage following the drilling platform explosion off New Orleans.

From all these incidents, from 1967 to the present, it is necessary to conclude that there is a very serious problem and that our present laws are inadequate to deal with that problem. The penalties contained in the Oil Pollution Act of 1924—personal punishment of a fine of up to $2,500 and imprisonment went up to 1 year, or both, and vessel liabilities of up to $10,000—do not begin to cope with the threats posed by the expanding oil extraction and transportation industry. Far larger oil tankers, drilling platforms operated improperly or placed in seismically active offshore land, and increasing commerce with increasing chance of accidents—all call for the reform provided by this bill.

The conference report contains provisions for absolute liability to the United States, unless the owner or operator can prove that the discharge resulted solely from an act of God, an act of war, an act of U.S. Government negligence, or an act or omission of a third party. The limits on the liability have been set at $14 million for a vessel and $8 million for offshore or onshore facilities. This liability may not be high enough for the future, but it is sufficient to pay for the cleanup of the most disastrous spill on record.

A second provision of the bill that is needed badly is contained in section 21, which requires any applicant for a Federal license or permit with respect to the navigable waters of the United States to obtain certification that his activities will not violate existing water quality standards. This broad provision is very important. Among other things, it offers us the possibility of responding to the expanding demand for electric power and yet giving those parties especially concerned with the pollution generated along with that power a means, outside of the courts, for seeing that their concerns are considered.

This is vitally needed legislation and it has my wholehearted support. It is an integral part of the growing Federal effort aimed at assuring a quality environment for present as well as future generations. It is a sensible balancing of the growing demands of our people for the benefits from oil and electricity, and the benefits of a clean, healthy, life-promoting environment.

Mr. DENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am a strong supporter of programs for improvement of our environment. One of the best of these that I see working in my district is the small watershed program—Public Law 566. I have been on these projects during the planning stage and have seen the problems faced by the local people and I have seen the projects with the land treatment on the land and the dams in place.

I strongly support the SCS budget increasing construction by $8,246,000. Why, I ask, since Aowa Creek watershed in Dixon County has been approved by Congress, have not funds been made available for construction. This is unfair to the local people. I have seen gullies in Aowa watershed 30 feet deep, eating away at the landscape and threatening roads and bridges. These gullies will continue to grow until action is taken. Gully erosion is an extremely serious problem throughout my district.

This source of sediment which causes pollution of our streams must be controlled. Also, the day must come when this land will be needed to satisfy our expanding population. The small watershed program is a natural for stopping these gullies and healing up the landscape. Frequent and devastating floods have plagued Nebraska during its entire history, and the people want to do something about them. In my district, the Nemaha Basin is now entirely covered with applications for assistance under the small watershed program. This work must go forward.

The accelerated land treatment program, an integral part of the small watersheds, supplements the going program of the soil and water conservation districts in holding soil and water on the farm, thus reducing sediment production and preventing agricultural chemicals from polluting the streams in the State.

Eastern Nebraska was not blessed with natural lakes. The small watershed program, however, is being used to develop water-based recreation that can satisfy a large part of this increasing demand for recreation. These recreational opportunities will make eastern Nebraska a better place in which to live, and will help prevent the outmigration of people.

As I have said, I support the SCS budget increasing construction funds, however, I am concerned at the sharp drop in planning funds. In my district alone there are 30 applications not yet planned even though 17 projects have been authorized and funded for construction and six projects completed.

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the conference report.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 358, nays 0, not voting 72, as follows:

ENROLLMENT OF TITLE OF H.R. 4148, WATER QUALITY IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1970

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 559) and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution as follows:

H. CON. RES. 559

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill H.R. 4148 the Clerk of the House of Representatives is authorized and directed to enroll the title so as to read: "An Act to amend the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, as amended, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. EDMONDSON). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the conference report just agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

PROVIDING ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BAIL AGENCY, 1970

Mr. DOWDY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H.R. 16612) to amend the District of Columbia Bail Agency Act to provide additional funds for the District of Columbia Bail Agency for fiscal year 1970, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 16612

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 9 of the District of Columbia Bail Agency Act (D.C. Code, sec. 23-908) is amended by striking out ", but not to exceed $130,000 in any one fiscal year,".

Mr. DOWDY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, the District of Columbia Bail Agency has been given, under the provisions of the omnibus anticrime bill which passed the House recently, a great deal of additional authority and responsibility.

They are presently operating under a ceiling of $130,000, and they will run out of money immediately. They will need about $40,000 more to finish out this fiscal year.

The committee has been advised there is an urgent need for this legislation. It is requested by the Director of the District of Columbia Bail Agency and by the chief judge of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, as I said, because of the additional workload occasioned by the increased number of investigations required of the Agency.

I urge the adoption of the bill.

Mr. NELSEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Speaker, I only wish to add that by statutory limitation, the authorization of appropriations was set at $130,000. Because of the great increase in arrests and consequently the demand for services, the bail agency finds it will be impossible to continue operations to the end of the fiscal year. The funds are available by reallocation but the limitation on the authorization prevents the Appropriation Subcommittee from making the necessary reallocation for the agency to execute the bail act as enacted by Congress.

There was no opposition whatever in the committee to this bill. I hope the bill will be passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR BALANCE OF WEEK

(Mr. GERALD R. FORD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. GERALD R. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I take this time for the purpose of asking the distinguished majority leader the program for the remainder of the week as far as he can report it.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the distinguished gentleman yield?

Mr. GERALD R. FORD. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, we do not expect any more legislative business this week. I say that in spite of the fact that I must also say that we are compelled not to adjourn for an Easter recess and will not adjourn for an Easter recess unless and until the mail problem is solved. We will not program ordinary legislation during the remainder of this week or next week, and we will undertake, if the Members are needed here, to advise Members. I am sure the gentleman from Michigan will cooperate with us in trying to give Members ample notice of any emergency legislation which might come up.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GERALD R. FORD, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Will the distinguished majority leader give us some idea of where we are on this mail situation now, if the gentleman knows?

Mr. ALBERT. I cannot answer the gentleman. The gentleman probably knows that as far as the pending legislation is concerned the conferees met this morning and they will meet again this afternoon. I am not sure what will happen, but we do not expect any action on this matter this week. I can almost assure the gentleman of that. Otherwise I would not make this announcement. But I must say that we are not going to adjourn through next week.

Mr. PUCINSKI. The gentleman is saying, then, we will be here Monday for official business?

Mr. ALBERT. We will be here. The House will meet on Monday.

SUPPORTING LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH A FEDERAL ADMINISTRATIVE JUSTICE CENTER

(Mr. KASTENMEIER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill to fill a great and growing need of the Federal Government. My bill (H.R. 16663) would establish a Federal Administrative Justice Center with responsibility for encouraging and supporting the continuing legal education of lawyers in the service of the Federal Government.

There are about 10,000 lawyers in the Federal service. This includes some 600 hearing examiners appointed under the Administrative Act. They play a vital role in the administration and enforcement of the law. The Government has shown a keen interest in attracting capable young attorneys, and in making their posts attractive. But more attention should be given to measures which will induce the ablest to remain with the Government and enable all lawyers in Federal service to perform their duties more capably.

The measure I have introduced is also being introduced in the other body by the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. KENNEDY. It is designed to fill a part of this gap by encouraging Government lawyers to develop their skills and to keep abreast of developments in Congress, the courts, the agencies, and in society, to the end that they may be prepared to perform their duties more competently and also to undertake effectively future challenges.

The bar has long recognized the desirability of continuing legal education. The First National Conference on the Continuing Education of the Bar which met at Arden House in 1958 emphasized this, saying:

> American lawyers today are confronted with problems of vast and increasing complexity. No law school education can be expected to deal with all of these problems. A practicing lawyer has an obligation to continue his education throughout his professional life. This education not only must increase his professional competence but also better qualify him to meet his professional responsibilities to his clients and to the public.

What was there said of the lawyer in general applies with special force to the lawyer in Government service.

Some Government lawyers and hearing examiners now have access to continuing legal education courses provided by the agencies which employ them. Others have access to courses sponsored by the Civil Service Commission, the bar associations, and the law schools. However, what is available falls short of the need and remedial legislation seems indicated.

In 1962 the personnel committee of the Administrative Conference of the United States noted the lack of well-rounded career development and training programs specially designed for lawyers in Federal service. In 1966 the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission and in 1967 the Presidential Task Force on Career Advancement observed that this deficiency still existed. In 1969 the American Bar Association and the Administrative Conference of the United States, adopted resolutions again pointing to the need for improved continuing legal education in the Government, and recommended as a remedy the founding by the Government of a Center in Washington which would be responsible for this activity.

The proposed Center would be organized as a new agency. It does not appear feasible to assign the function to any existing Government organization. Policy will be determined by a Board of Visitors, with the Attorney General as Chairman. A majority of the Board would consist of persons in Government employ; an outside viewpoint would be provided by members chosen from the private bar and law schools.

The activities of the Center would be supervised by a staff of lawyers similar to the administration of a law school. The staff would be small. The Center's proposed budget of $400,000 is a modest one. Students would be designated by the agencies of the Government employing them as lawyers. Fees covering the cost of a course would be paid out of funds available for training purposes by the agencies sending their lawyers to the courses organized by the Center.

The Center would work closely with the departments, agencies, and hearing examiners to identify education needs and to develop effective legal education programs, recruiting the expert faculty for each particular course as the need arises. This should avoid any necessity for the Center to employ a large permanent staff.

The Center is not intended to overlap the existing powers and responsibilities of any agency of the Government. Where training of lawyers is now done well within the Government, it would continue unimpaired. The Center would be expected to effect its role where a need for further education of lawyers is not adequately provided.

Continuing legal education could encourage more capable young lawyers to join the Government and help retain experienced attorneys of undoubted ability.

The Federal Administrative Justice Center is designed to fulfill a need for continuing legal education which will endure as long as there is an insistence that Government be administered with competence and justice. Continuing education is particularly essential to lawyers employed by the Federal Government during this time of rapid changes in our economy and society.

THE PRESIDENT'S VIEWS ON SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

(Mr. CORMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CORMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Nation now has the benefit of the President's views on school desegregation. One can, after a cursory reading, conclude that there is something in it for everybody.

I would call one specific passage of the President's statement to the attention of my colleagues because it relates to the case of Crawford against the Board of Education of the City of Los Angeles, which I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this past Monday.

The President characterizes this case as "probably the most extreme judicial decree so far," and goes on to conclude, "I believe it is preferable—when we have to make the choice, between desegregation and improvement of education—to use limited financial resources for the improvement of education."

But, the President does consistently reject toleration of de jure segregation, and deals with de facto segregation by saying "de facto segregation, which exists in many areas both North and South, is undesirable but is not generally held to violate the Constitution. Thus residential housing patterns may result in the continued existence of some all-Negro schools even in a system which fully meets constitutional standards. But in any event, local school officials may, if they so choose, take steps beyond the constitutional minimums to diminish racial separation."

The President may be faulted on two grounds in his characterization of the decision in the Los Angeles Board of Education case. First, Judge Gitelson found clearly that the Los Angeles board was guilty of de jure segregation; and second, whether it was de jure or de facto, the State board of education, at the time the case was before the court, had prescribed special goals to end de facto segregation, with which the local board had to comply.

Before one becomes either exalted or fearful—depending on one's own objective in the issue—about how much support for the desegregation of our elementary and secondary schools we can expect from the President of the United States, we must remember that this statement was delivered by the man who fired Leon Panetta, his own director for civil rights, and nominated Judge Carswell to the Supreme Court.

THE COMPREHENSIVE HEADSTART CHILD DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1970

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, on March 19, I joined 40 of my colleagues in the House of Representatives in sponsoring the Comprehensive Headstart Child Development Act of 1970. The need for early childhood services has been well documented, and I will not dwell on it at this time except to say that many millions of children need services before they are 6 years old—children from culturally deprived families, children of working mothers, children from families undergoing temporary crises, and children whose parents just want them to have every possible advantage. It is the long-range purpose of this legislation, therefore, to spur the development of a comprehensive network of early childhood services sufficient to meet the national need.

To do this, however, a number of short-range steps are necessary. Several of these steps have already been taken, in fact, by the Republican administration—the organization of the Office of Child Development, the initiation of experimental activities to improve programs, and the proposal of welfare reform which includes day-care services for children of welfare mothers.

The rationale underlying this legislation is that still other measures are also necessary to build the kind of foundation sufficient to support a national early childhood structure. Title I of the bill consolidates several existing Federal programs into a single Federal program administered by a single Federal agency. Subsequent titles provide a beginning toward the research, personnel and facilities which will be needed to support broad scale early childhood programs and which are so sorely lacking at present.

If we accept as a long-range goal the provision of early childhood services for all who need them or desire them, we must understand that the eventual cost of such services could be as high as $22 billion annually by 1975. Obviously the Federal Government cannot be expected ever to assume a burden of these proportions, and State and local governments, already financially strapped, are not any better equipped to take over the job of financing such an immense effort.

A concept underlying this entire act, therefore, is that all parents must pay as much as they are able of the costs of services received by their children. The sliding fee-scale proposed in the bill will assure this, and will also mean that the overwhelming portion of Federal funds will be used to enable economically disadvantaged children to participate in early childhood programs.

Second, we must look to private enterprise, which has in the past supplied over half of all early childhood services, for the greatest future growth. Programs will be developed by private entrepreneurs, by employers of large numbers of working mother—hospitals are leading in this area at present, and by unions. Such private initiative—traditionally taking the form of private kindergartens, nursery schools, summer day camps, and child care centers—will be required to meet the same high standards as prevail for public and private nonprofit programs. In too many parts of the country, child care services are not available even for mothers who are willing to pay high prices for them. A mortgage-guarantee program to assist privately sponsored programs in meeting the large initial cost of constructing or acquiring a facility is included in this legislation, and it is hoped that this, together with the sliding fee-scale concept, will help stimulate the development of early childhood services in areas where they are needed.

(Mr. DELLENBACK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DELLENBACK. Mr. Speaker, I want my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL), to know that I particularly appreciate his joining with us in sponsoring legislation in this most important area of early childhood services.

Many bills have been introduced in this session of Congress which approach from several different directions the problem of providing adequate and appropriate early childhood services. Hearings have been completed by the House Education and Labor Committee's Select Subcommittee, and members from both parties are now working toward developing landmark legislation on a bipartisan basis which addresses itself realistically to the problem. It is expected that the subcommittee will act on the legislation within a matter of days.

In addition, there have been extensive discussions and correspondence with various representatives from the administration who have given the Comprehensive Headstart Child Development Act of 1970 their most careful scrutiny. After long deliberation, a letter was prepared which outlines the administration's response to this legislative proposal. We were especially pleased to note the strong affirmative statement supporting the underlying rationale of the bill as well as substantial agreement with many of the specific measures contained in the bill. This letter, from the Office of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, dated March 19, 1970, reads as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE,
Washington, D.C., March 19, 1970.

Hon. JOHN R. DELLENBACK,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. DELLENBACK: I very much appreciate the interest and concern regarding comprehensive Child Development legislation expressed in your letter of February 8, 1970. I am writing to express the views of this Department on your bill, H.R. 15776, and the revised versions introduced by Senator Winston Prouty (S. 3480) and Representative Gerald Ford and others (H.R. 16265). My comments are addressed to these later versions. Because the Select Committee on Education has terminated its public hearings on this important subject, I will make my comments in this letter rather than waiting for a meeting to be arranged.

As you know, our Administration shares your concern and interest in early childhood development and has already taken a number of steps toward expanding and improving the administration of programs in this area. These include establishment of the Office of Child Development to serve as the focal point for the early childhood development activities in the Federal Government, and intensification of research and experimental programs as proposed in the FY 1970 and FY 1971 budgets and in the President's recent message on education. Furthermore, as you note in your letter, the President has proposed, and the House Ways and Means Committee has ordered reported as part of H.R. 16311, a substantial day care program for low income families who qualify under the Family Assistance Plan. That program alone anticipates an increase of over 65 percent in Federal expenditures for preschool and day care programs.

We realize, however, that there is considerable interest in the Congress in going beyond these significant steps to enact some form of comprehensive child development legislation. The work of your Task Force and the Select Committee have provided an examination of a number of alternatives in this vital area. The Administration is in substantial agreement with many of the policies and concepts embodied in your legislative proposals. We applaud your initiative to consolidate the major authorities for preschool and day care programs. This is wholly consistent with the Administration's commitment to streamline the Federal Government and to make it more responsive to the needs of the people.

The Department agrees with and strongly supports the graduated and controlled approach to increases in budget authority taken by the bill. We have learned that we cannot wisely use enormous new appropriations before having developed effective technology, trained sufficient numbers of professional and paraprofessional staff, and devised an efficient delivery system. We must take the time to learn from programs such as Head Start, where there have been a number of disappointments as well as some real successes. We feel that the expansion of child care services as proposed in the Family Assistance Act—amounting to almost $400 million in the first full year of operation—is an appropriate and justifiable expansion at this time.

As a part of the Department's continuous planning and evaluation process we are currently reviewing the interdepartmental day care standards and we will continue to do so in the future. While we do agree with the provision of statutory authority to set standards which your legislation provides, we do not think specific standards should be incorporated in the statute. New knowledge is developing rapidly in this field and there is need to provide different levels of service in different situations, and we should retain the flexibility to adapt to this varying picture. My staff assures me that there is agreement on this point between the Administration and the sponsors of the legislation.

Another important area of agreement is in providing the Secretary with authority to disapprove grants or contracts which are not consistent with Federal law or regulations and to entertain appeals from organizations which feel that a State or local commission or agency has acted improperly. We are pleased to note that this authority is already provided in the latest versions of the proposal. We believe that the Secretary should have clear authority to fund programs directly in cases where an agency or commission is unwilling or unable to comply with Federal law or regulations, but we feel that clarifying language is needed in this regard.

The Department agrees with the principle of providing mortgage insurance for facilities which is included in your proposal. As you know, we do not favor making Federal grant funds available for new construction except in the most limited and exceptional circumstances. Federal support in the construction area should be primarily in the form of loan guarantees (a form of which is suggested in the bill), interest subsidies, or lease guarantees, rather than through direct grants.

We do feel that it is imperative that any such legislation provide sufficient flexibility for the Secretary to assure compatibility with the purposes and structure of the major new child care provisions of the Family Assistance Act which is expected to be before the House during April. In particular, care should be taken not to repeal Title IV of the Social Security Act because it will contain the child care authority of the Family Assistance Plan, should that proposal become law. This mechanism as amended in H.R. 16311 is critical to the success of the Family Assistance work training and employment system. We would, however, see to it that the child care provided pursuant to any comprehensive act and that provided under the Social Security Act are compatible insofar as possible.

The bill places substantial decision making powers in a State Commission. We agree with the need to decentralize such authority from the Federal to the State Government level. We feel, however, that mandating a new set of commissions in every State is not appropriate at this time. Policy control and program review authority should certainly be vested in some mechanism which ensures participation by a range of interested groups, including education and welfare agencies, parents, and public, nonprofit, and private proprietary program sponsors, but Governors should be given the flexibility to comply with that mandate in a variety of ways. In the area of actual program operation and administration, Governors should likewise have the authority to use either existing State agencies or to create a new agency. We also think that provision should be made for large local communities to have their own decision-making mechanism with regard to the choice of program sponsors.

We believe that improved coordination with preschool programs under Title I is highly desirable, but should be accomplished in such a way as to encourage continued and expanded involvement of the public schools. Repeal of the Title I preschool authority may inhibit needed cooperative and sequential planning between preschool child care and in-school activities. We think that our common purpose of achieving closer coordination could be better served by authorizing and directing the Commissioner of Education and the Director of the Office of Child Development to develop compatible policies for programs under their jurisdiction, and by requiring broadly based planning mechanisms at the State and local levels.

It is our feeling that the Secretary should have greater authority to use funds for direct grants, contracts, demonstrations, and innovative service delivery systems, with particular emphasis involving the private sector and testing voucher approaches. We would hope that a significant portion of the funds could be reserved to the Secretary for such direct grants and contracts. Authority for the Secretary to require experimentation by State and local agencies with innovative and improved delivery systems should also be provided. We are particularly anxious that the Secretary's authority be broad enough to encourage use of a variety of service providers in such a way that competition and parent choice can be properly expanded.

While we wholly sympathize with the purposes of the bill to establish a separate National Institute of Early Childhood Development, we think that the Office of Child Development as well as the President's proposed National Institute of Education (NIE) provides an improved framework to achieve the same objectives. Certainly, the proposed NIE could devote a substantial share of its resources and efforts in the area of early childhood education and we would very much appreciate discussing the interrelationship of these two institutions with you and your colleagues.

Your legislative proposal provides authority for the establishing of fee schedules to permit entry of non-disadvantaged children into these child development programs in return for payment of some or all of the costs, and we agree with this sliding fee schedule concept provided such schedules are subject to the approval of the Secretary. The available Federal Government dollars must be put to priority uses, however, namely the provision of day care and child development services to low income children. It is important, therefore, to give the Secretary authority to place a limit on the amount of subsidy which can be allocated to support non-disadvantaged children.

I cannot hope in this letter to comment fully on all the issues raised by the bill, but I would suggest, if you so desire, that the staff of the Department is available to you and to the Select Committee to assist you in drafting a bill which meets our mutual concerns.

In closing I would like to emphasize our appreciation for the support which you and your colleagues have given to the Administration's efforts so far. I feel that you are definitely embarked on the right track with your consolidation proposal and want to be of all possible assistance to you in furthering this effort.

Sincerely,

JOHN G. VENEMAN,
Acting Secretary.

THE COMPREHENSIVE HEADSTART CHILD DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1970

(Mr. HANSEN of Idaho asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HANSEN of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend my colleague from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL) on his sponsorship of the Comprehensive Headstart Child Development Act of 1970 and on his thoughtful analysis of the need for the enactment of this legislation. I also want to acknowledge the exceptional contribution the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. DELLENBACK) has made in the development of this bill. The House Select Education Subcommittee under the leadership of its chairman, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS) has concluded lengthy public hearings on child development legislation. Almost without exception the witnesses who testified during the course of these hearings emphasized the urgency of the development of meaningful programs for children in the preschool-age group.

We are hopeful that we will soon be able to bring a bill to the floor of the House which responds to this need. I am confident that the bill will be the product of the bipartisan efforts of many Members of the House and of the cooperation between the Congress and the administration. We have a unique opportunity in this legislation to implement the commitment President Nixon made early in his administration to enhance the first 5 years of life. This will truly be landmark legislation.

By providing for intervention during the early years of life we can, in this bill, do more in the long run to improve the quality of life about which the President has often spoken than with any other legislation to come before this Congress.

CLEANING UP THE POTOMAC RIVER

(Mr. GUDE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GUDE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend Secretary Hickel in pressing forward with plans to clean up our Potomac River and make it a credit to the Capital of our Nation. He has announced preliminary plans to modernize and upgrade the Blue Plains plant where 80 percent of municipal wastes for Metropolitan Washington are handled.

Several days ago I had the opportunity to visit the Blue Plains plant and to inspect firsthand the pilot waste treatment project of the Federal Water Pollution Control Commission where innovative technology is being studied and developed. This research outdates the conventional systems of waste treatment as the jet plane outdates the balloon.

Secretary Hickel states that the results of this research will bring about the installation of a sophisticated waste treatment system that would pump treated water of near drinkable quality into the Potomac. The system combines the use of pure oxygen with a new physical-chemical treatment. The technique combines elements of new systems already in operation elsewhere.

The new system would raise the daily capacity of Blue Plains from the current 240 million gallons to 309 million gallons. The process removes nearly 100 percent of the biological impurities, 96 percent of the phosphates, and 85 percent of the nitrogen in waste water. In announcing the plans the Secretary said:

> I believe that the long awaited cleanup of the Potomac now will finally become reality within a few years. It illustrates how imaginative and inventive research can rise to the occasion.

Funds will be needed to institute this cleanup if we in Congress are going to fulfill our pledge to restore our environment. I urge that we stand behind the administration in this work to clean up the Nation's river as well as all the other streams and lakes of the United States.

THE POSTAL STRIKE

(Mr. AYRES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, we have all been concerned about the postal strike. Perhaps the Members read in yesterday's paper the comments made by our colleague from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER), where it was absolutely necessary for those men and women who have been on strike, be on strike to pinpoint the problem. Although I do not agree with the fact that they struck on the basis that it was illegal, but I agree that their reasons for striking were perfectly justifiable.

As the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER) pointed out, until we pay the city postal workers more money than we do the rural postal workers, we are going to have trouble.

I would suggest to the Congress, both the House and the other body, that they handle this matter like labor negotiates labor contracts. This thing is a mess. We all know this. In fact, the conferees met, and now they have agreed to meet again later this afternoon—with no solution anticipated.

They are going to drag this out and nobody is going to be happy. Why do we not set a date, say, April 30, at which time a bill will be on the desk of the President to sign or to veto. I have confidence in the executive branch of the Government, and I have confidence in the House of Representatives and I have confidence in the other body, and when the union leaders such as President Radamacher say that "we want a differential rate between the cities and the rural areas," we all know it has to come, and it should have come 20 years ago.

By providing now a date certain I feel confident that we can get those things in a bill that are necessary to improve the postal service, the executive branch can get partially what they want, the postal workers will get their increase, and we will get better postal service. Any agreement can be made retroactive.

Mr. Speaker, I would hope that this suggestion be considered very, very seriously. I have issued the following statement:

STATEMENT BY WILLIAM H. AYRES

Mr. Radamacher, President, National Association of Letter Carriers, AFL–CIO, has approved the concept of regional, or sectional negotiation in dealing with postal workers' wage scales. I urged adoption of this same concept more than 15 years ago.

One way to implement the regional concept, is to require the Civil Service Commission to meet with the postal workers' representatives in adjusting their wage scales. The Commission, already established in 10 regions throughout the Nation, has had experience in dealing with similar wage adjustment situations.

Cost of living indexes vary throughout the Nation. The postal workers in my district, a highly industrial complex, have been penalized because their pay is no greater than that of postal workers in other parts of the country where the cost of living is lower.

I am convinced that most postal workers will support my request to both Secretary of Labor Shultz and Postmaster General Blount to seek an increase in pay on a regional basis for postal workers in my district. I am also convinced that postal workers will support my concept of placing them in a "bargaining position" in dealing with these matters in the future rather than to continue to rely on highly paid professionals to lobby the Congress periodically on their behalf. I want also to commend the leadership as well as the postal workers themselves in my district for restoring the much needed mail service that was interrupted recently. They can rest assured of my support in every legitimate effort to secure equitable wage adjustments for them now and in the future.

THE PRESIDENT'S SCHOOL DESEGREGATION MESSAGE

(Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I rise to commend President Nixon for his thoughtful, perceptive, and forthright statement on school desegregation.

Recognizing full well the profound implications of a Presidential statement in a time and area so fraught with emotion, I believe the President has set the proper tone and course for the people of this country.

The President places school desegregation in perspective. He has clearly set out the state of the laws as developed by the courts and the Congress, and he pledges his administration to carry out these laws.

More importantly he has set out a course for the Nation to follow on the basis of the law.

I am hopeful that those who have been suspicious of the motivation of the President and his executive branch associates will now be willing to recognize the administration's good faith and commitment to uphold the law and achieve a free and open society.

The actions of the conference committee on the Elementary and Secondary Amendments of 1970 have again brought the debate on the Stennis amendment to the other body. Because of this the President's clarification of the distinction between de jure and de facto segregation takes on added significance. As a member of the conference committee I would prefer to see us drop the Stennis amendment altogether, but the clarifying language adopted by the conference is the minimum required.

The President's statement quite properly says:

> Racial imbalance in a school system may be partly de jure in origin, and partly de facto. In such a case, it is appropriate to insist on remedy for the de jure portion, which is unlawful, without insisting on a remedy for the lawful de facto portion.
> De facto racial separation, resulting genuinely from housing patterns, exists in the South as well as the North; in neither area should this condition by itself be cause for federal enforcement actions. De jure segregation brought about by deliberate school board gerrymandering exists in the North as well as the South; in both areas this must be remedied. In all respects, the law should be applied equally, North and South, East and West.

At this time and point I applaud this declaration of policy.

While condemning the gerrymandering of school districts to achieve segregation, the President has realized the very real values of the neighborhood school:

> The school stands in a unique relationship to the community, to the family and to the individual student. It is a focal point of community life. It has a powerful impact on the future of all who attend. It is a place not only of learning, but also of living—where a child's friendships center, where he learns to cooperate—and it is the one institution above all others with which the parent shares his child. . . .

message says, "has been to demand too much of our schools: They have been expected not only to educate, but also to accomplish a social transformation. . . ."

A major part of this task falls to the schools. But they cannot do it all or even most of it by themselves. Other institutions can share the burden of breaking down racial barriers, but only the schools can perform the task of education itself. If our schools fail to educate, then whatever they may achieve in integrating the races will turn out to be only a pyrrhic victory.

To assist school districts with the special problems of desegregating and to concentrate on the special needs of racially impacted and educationally disadvantaged school districts, the President has pledged $500 million for fiscal year 1971 and $1 billion for fiscal year 1972.

Prof. Charles Hamilton in commenting on the Alexander Bickel article in the New Republic said that segregationists "must be fought at every turn. But in our determination to defeat them," Hamilton stresses, we should not devise plans that defeat our purposes in other ways.

Hamilton contends:

The principle is a free and open society, and we can pursue several realistic routes to its achievement.

The President has pledged that he will continue to vigorously oppose unlawful segregation and he will continue to dedicate his administration to the goal of lowering artificial barriers in all aspects of American life.

The President writes:

We have overcome many problems in our 190 years as a nation, we can overcome this problem. We have managed to extend opportunity in other areas. We can extend it in this area. Just as other rights have been secured, so too can these rights be secured and once again the nation will be better for having done so.

In my judgment the President's statement is a reasoned, sound redeclaration of conscience, the Constitution, and commitment.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM

(Mr. FASCELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, during the past few years the Congress has done much to reshape our criminal laws and procedures in the effort to achieve a balanced and coordinated approach to the Nation's mounting crime problem. I am convinced that organized crime is a prime cause of the rising incidence of white collar and general crime.

In dealing with the unique menace of organized crime our criminal justice system is faced with obstacles that normally are not present in most other types of apprehensions and prosecutions. In some cases an organized criminal operation may involve hundreds of individuals, touch on a number of States and countries, ensnare countless victims, and corrupt the vital processes of government. All of this may be under the direction of a select and limited number of persons whose ability to perpetrate the giant conspiracy is exceeded only by their seeming success in escaping the clutches of the law.

If the approach to this menace is to prove successful we must have effective and just substantive laws aimed at crumbling the organizational foundation of organized crime and eliminating its source of illegal revenue. A legislative proposal which goes a long way toward those goals has been passed by the Senate and is now before the House Judiciary Committee. I am confident S. 30 will receive the overwhelming bipartisan support in the House as it did in the Senate. I support it fully.

An indispensable concomitant of S. 30, however, is a measure that will provide training to our Federal, State, and local organized crime prosecutors. There is little doubt that the prosecutor is the one key element of the criminal justice system whose training needs have been neglected. Upon the prosecutor rests much of the responsibility for coordinating the activities of the law enforcement and correctional agencies. Beyond this, the prosecutor is expected to deal with the complex phenomenon of organized crime, while having received little, if any, preparation for this task in law school.

Recently I introduced a bill which establishes, under the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration, a permanent training program for Federal, State, and local prosecuting attorneys engaged in organized crime prosecution. The bill also directs the Attorney General to conduct annual conferences of Federal, State, and local officials engaged in combating organized crime and to submit an annual report on organized crime in the United States and the progress of efforts against it.

I am pleased to report that 23 of my colleagues have joined with me in cosponsorship of this measure. Having previously introduced this bill in behalf of eight of the cosponsors, today I reintroduce it in behalf of 15 Members. I am very encouraged by this bipartisan support and by the other favorable comments this measure has evoked.

OBSCENITY

(Mr. WYLIE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, this morning, I noticed an article in the Washington Post with the headline, "Public Hearings Set on Smut." The article goes on to say that the Presidential Commission on Obscenity and Pornography, which has been receiving testimony from experts for nearly 2 years, is about to hear from the public.

Two weeks ago, on March 11, I was invited to testify before two members of this Commission, the Reverend Winfrey C. Link, a Methodist minister from Nashville, Tenn., and the Reverend Morton A. Hill, S.J., president of Morality in Media, Inc., in New York. They were holding public hearings on their own initiative because the chairman of the committee and, indeed, a majority of the members of the committee had apparently not seen the value of hearing from the public.

The article is disturbing in that it says the recommendations of the Commission are not expected before September of this year. The Commission was established by President Johnson in October 1967, for the purpose of analyzing existing laws concerning the distribution and effects of obscenity and pornography on the public and particularly upon minors. This, I am certain, was in response to pressure from the public to do something about what most people know to be a serious problem. Whether the Commission was motivated by the action of Reverend Link and Reverend Hill, I do not know. But I wish to commend Dr. Link and Father Hill for going ahead on their own and focusing attention on the importance of the mood of the country on this problem.

Another disturbing point is the allegation by Reverend Link that seven members of the Commission are against strong controls on obscene materials.

The article was further revealing in that the Commission has ordered research studies at a cost of $1.9 million on such topics as: Examination of erotic stimuli on junior college girls and unwed pregnant high school girls; comparison of responses of jailed sex offenders with those of people of similar economic and ethnic background; and review of Denmark's abolition of pornography laws and the effect on reducing sex crimes.

I agree with Dr. Link that "At the rate the Commission's report is going, it will not be worth a hill of beans."

All of this leads me to the conclusion that Congress cannot wait for the Commission's report if it plans any action this year. As I have suggested in a special order last June, in testimony before the Post Office and the Judiciary Committees, and in a letter to all members of the House and the other body who have introduced anti-obscenity legislation, Congress could enact a statute similar to the law in the State of New York which was upheld in the so-called second Ginsberg case—Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629. Using this approach, a law could be passed prohibiting the dissemination of obscene materials to minors under the age of 18 through the mails or instrumentalities of interstate commerce.

The Post Office and Civil Service Committee has indeed reported out a bill which would do this. This measure now awaits action in the Rules Committee. Unfortunately, none has been requested as of this date. It should be brought to the floor for consideration immediately. It is obvious to me that the Judiciary Committee, which has numerous obscenity bills pending before it, is not going to act in the 91st Congress.

THE LATE HONORABLE ELIJAH LEWIS FORRESTER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. BRINKLEY) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Speaker, former Congressman Elijah Lewis Forrester, affectionally known as "Tic" Forrester, was a man concerned about his country. He was concerned about it because he loved it so much, and thus it is that his loss on Thursday, March 19, 1970, is the loss of all of us.

A man of honor and distinction, Tic, a Democrat, of Leesburg, Lee County, Ga., was born August 16, 1896, on a farm 1½ miles from Leesburg. He was educated in the Leesburg schools, and studied law in the office of his cousin, R. R. Forrester, and subsequently passed the State bar examination in 1917, and was admitted to the practice of law in Georgia. He was married to Thursba Marie Whitaker in 1929. His dear wife survives him, and my wife Lois and I express deep and heartfelt sympathy to her and to other members of the family.

Tic served as a private in World War I, then won a post as the solicitor of the city court of Leesburg, where he served from 1920 to 1933. He was elected mayor of Leesburg in 1922 and served in this capacity until 1931; was county attorney for Lee County from 1928 to 1937, and solicitor-general for the southwestern judicial circuit from 1937 until 1950.

Tic was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives from the Third District of Georgia on November 7, 1950, and served with great dedication until his retirement in 1964. During this time he was a valued member of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Not only was Tic an outstanding public servant, but he was also an outstanding citizen in his community. He was a member and chairman of the Board of Deacons of the First Baptist Church of Leesburg, and a former Sunday school teacher. On Sunday, one knew where to find Tic Forrester.

He also served as a member of the American Legion, was recently recognized as the Dougherty Civitan Club outstanding citizen and was placed in nomination for the Outstanding Citizen of North America Award.

Tic was known as the personable Georgia statesman who never lost an election. Fiercely patriotic, Tic recently wrote to Vice President AGNEW commending him for urging that the television media be more objective in its news reporting.

Tic was also concerned with programs which he believed to be of a socialistic nature. He was concerned about a new development in Lee County, Ga.

In a recent speech which he made during the post office dedication in Americus, Ga., the work of the man and the philosophy of the man was evident, and he was given a tremendous ovation on that occasion reflecting the very high sentiment and regard in which he was held.

The first time I saw Tic Forrester, I was an associate attorney with the firm of Young, Hollis & Moseley in Columbus, Ga. My office was near the front of the building and Tic Forrester entered into the building and strode purposefully down the hall which went past my office. From that time forward, I learned to love him.

The last time I was near him was at his funeral. The church was overflowing and many of us could not get in. Four men had accompanied me from Columbus: J. R. Estes, Jr., W. H. Young, Jr., Gerald B. Saunders, and James A. Byars. Were it not for his illness, Ralph King would have been with us. All of these men were like brothers to Congressman Forrester. Our remarks and comments on that trip could be summed up in one sentence: "Tic Forrester was a good and decent man."

Mr. GERALD R. FORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRINKLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GERALD R. FORD. Mr. Speaker, Tic Forrester was a very close personal friend of mine. We had many delightful conversations and many opportunities to get together and to be together.

Tic Forrester's death will leave a great void in the hearts and minds of his many, many friends all over the United States, and particularly among those who served with him in the House of Representatives. He was a man of great political courage, and I believe a man of exceptional political wisdom.

I extend to the family of Tic Forrester my deepest personal condolences.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. FLYNT), who was with us on Saturday at Leesburg, Ga., together with his wife for comments that I know he wishes to make.

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of my friend and colleague from Georgia (Mr. BRINKLEY).

I was saddened last Thursday, March 19, 1970, when I received word that my beloved friend and former colleague, Hon. E. L. Forrester died suddenly in the hospital at Albany, Ga.

Known to his former colleagues and to his family and friends alike as "Tic," Elijah Lewis Forrester served his district, State, and Nation as the Representative of the Third Congressional District of Georgia for seven terms.

He was nominated in the Democratic primary in September 1950 and subsequently was elected in the 1950 general election. He was sworn in on January 3, 1951, and served until his voluntary retirement, January 3, 1965.

He was born near Leesburg, Lee County, Ga., August 16, 1896, and was educated in the public schools of Lee County, Ga., and studied law under his cousin, Hon. R. R. Forrester, a prominent lawyer of southwest Georgia.

He served in World War I after volunteering for service shortly after war was declared in April 1917 and served until honorably discharged in 1918.

As his body lay in state before the funeral which was conducted in the First Baptist Church, Leesburg, his casket was covered with the flag of the United States of America. It remained there until it was tenderly folded and presented to his widow at the conclusion of the graveside services in the city cemetery.

No American ever deserved the right to have his casket covered with the flag of our country more than "Tic" Forrester because he loved his flag and his country with a fervent devotion.

Though small in stature, he stood tall in the eyes and hearts of the people of his hometown and district. He was their most prominent citizen who had served them well for 53 years—as soldier, lawyer, statesman, and friend.

Last Saturday the rain fell on Leesburg in torrents and the rain was in cloudburst proportions, but his friends came from far and near to pay their final respects and tribute to their friend who had served them loyally and well.

Those friends overflowed the church sanctuary, they filled and overflowed the Sunday school building and many had to brave the rain and stand outside.

They stayed through the brief but appropriate and impressive service at the church and then rode or walked slowly that mile to his last final resting place.

It seemed that nearly the whole cemetery was filled with raised umbrellas of his loved ones and friends.

They came from every county of the 24 counties which comprised his district when he served them as their Representative in the Congress of the United States of America. They came also from the counties which were placed in a different congressional district when the last reapportionment act was passed. They came from counties which were never in the Third Congressional District because his influence was felt beyond his district and he was loved by his friends in neighboring districts as he was loved by those of his own district.

Mr. Forrester began the study of law and was admitted to the practice of law in 1917. When "Tic" returned from World War I, he commenced the practice of law in Leesburg, Ga., in 1919.

He was soon elected city attorney, then county attorney, and then solicitor of the court of Lee County.

In 1936, he was elected solicitor general of the southwestern judicial circuit in which capacity he served from January 1, 1937, until January 3, 1951, when he resigned to take his oath of office as U.S. Representative in Congress.

In 1929, he was married to Miss Thursba Marie Whitaker of Leesburg. From the day of their wedding until last Thursday March 19, 1970, he loved her with a devotion which seemed to grow stronger each day of the 41 years of their married life. He was a devoted husband.

Mr. Speaker, I include as a part of my remarks, the news account of his death and an editorial which appeared in the Albany, Ga., Herald on Friday, March 20, 1970:

NOTED LAWYER, SOLON: "TIC" FORRESTER DEAD AT AGE 73

LEESBURG, GA.—Former Third District Rep. E. L. "Tic" Forrester, 73, of Leesburg, a member of a prominent Lee County family and longtime champion of political conservatism, died Thursday afternoon at Phoebe Putney Hospital in Albany after an apparent heart attack.

Forrester had suffered a mild heart attack about two weeks ago and was hospitalized in Albany for several days. He was rushed back to the Albany hospital from his home at nearby Leesburg.

The veteran politician never lost an election. He served six terms as solicitor general of the Southwest Judicial Circuit and went on to serve another six in Congress.

DEMOCRAT

Forrester, a Democrat, had served on the House Judiciary Committee and was in the forefront of the early Southern delegation's fight against civil rights.

After retiring from Congress three and a half years ago, Forrester returned to Leesburg, where he carried on a limited law practice and was a frequent speaker at public meetings in the area.

Mr. Forrester was born near Leesburg on Aug. 16, 1896, a son of the late Mary Elizabeth Kimbrough Forrester, and the late Richard Alexander Forrester. He was educated in Lee County schools.

He studied law in the office of his cousin, R. R. Forrester of Leesburg and Tifton until he was admitted to the bar in 1918.

Forrester served as a private in World War I, then won a post as the solicitor of the city court of Leesburg, where he served from 1920 to 1933. He married Thursba Marie Whitaker in 1929.

COUNTY ATTORNEY

He became county attorney in 1928 and won the solicitor's post in 1937.

He attained prominence as a solicitor by successfully prosecuting a Negro woman, Rosa Lee Ingram, and her 14-year-old son, for the murder of a white Schley County farmer. The case received national publicity, and a battery of New York attorneys entered the case on behalf of the defendants.

In a series of appeals which eventually reached Federal courts, the Negro woman's sentence was reduced from death to life imprisonment and the youth was allowed to serve a prison sentence on probation.

Forrester, whose full name was Elijah Lewis Forrester, won his nickname in his youth because of his small size.

"Why, you are no larger than a wood tick," a friend once remarked. The nickname stuck, later being shortened to "Tic."

BAPTIST

He was a member and chairman of the board of deacons of the First Baptist Church of Leesburg and a former Sunday school teacher. He was a member of Leesburg Post No. 182, American Legion.

He recently received the Civitan Club "Outstanding Citizen Award."

Survivors include his wife, Thursba Whitaker Forrester of Leesburg; two sisters, Mrs. Roy Dorminey of Fitzgerald and Mrs. Charles E. Williams of Lexington, N.C.; two brothers, the Rev. R. H. Forrester and Edward S. Forrester, both of Leesburg, and several nieces and nephews.

The funeral will be held Saturday at 2:30 p.m. at First Baptist Church of Leesburg with the Rev. William L. Wooley, interim pastor, and the Rev. Bobby Moye, pastor of Kendricks Memorial Baptist Church of Columbus, officiating. Interment will follow in Leesburg Cemetery.

Pallbearers will be announced later by Kimbrell-Stern Funeral Directors.

ELIJAH LEWIS FORRESTER

Elijah Lewis Forrester was a man who loved his family, his region, his country and the principles he espoused with a fierce devotion. In the public service, which consumed the greater portion of his lifetime, he never made less than a total commitment, whether as Solicitor-general of the Southwestern Judicial Circuit or as the United States Congressman from the Third District of Georgia. Because of his alert response to the drumbeats within him, it was inevitable that he become a tempting target for his ideological opponents.

Yet he stood in the storm's eye of controversy and emerged unscathed. If he could not move his opponents—and they were numerous on public issues on Capitol Hill—at least he wrung from them a grudging respect for his steadfast integrity. Thus when the time came for him to leave his Washington post for reasons of health after a long and distinguished career, the House of Representatives rose en masse to salute him signally with honors that are seldom granted members of that body.

"Tic" Forrester was well aware that not all of his countrymen could approve his own beliefs, nor was he ever so intolerant of others as to demand utter acceptance. But he did insist and expect from all elements of this society the same fealty which he accorded the concept of a free America. He could not understand a patriotism that in any way fell short of the ideals to which he clung.

Small in stature but large in heart, he was the fighter to the core—indomitable and strong. We will not soon see his like again in our region of Georgia or in our Southland. The nation will be poorer for his loss.

Mr. Speaker, I also include as a part of my remarks the obituary account which appeared, with his picture in the Washington Post of March 20, 1970:

FORMER REPRESENTATIVE E. L. "TIC" FORRESTER

(By Martin Weil)

Former U.S. Rep. E. L. (Tic) Forrester (D-Ga.), 74, an outspoken enemy of civil rights legislation during a 14-year House career that began in 1951, died yesterday in an Albany, Ga., hospital after a heart attack.

The Georgia Democrat, known as one of his state's most conservative congressman when he retired from the House to his hometown of Leesburg, Ga., in 1964, because of a circulatory ailment. He suffered a mild heart attack a few weeks ago.

In April 1956, Rep. Forrester said he and many colleagues looked on the Eisenhower administration's new civil rights proposals as "punitive legislation" for which no justification had been shown.

A key provision of the measures would have allowed the Justice Department to step into civil rights disputes irrespective of state court action.

Passed by the House but kept off the Senate floor in 1956, civil rights legislation was again introduced in Congress in 1957, and again Rep. Forrester opposed it.

At a Judiciary Subcommittee hearing, he shook a finger, banged a fist, quoted the Bible and called the legislation "a monstrosity" and "a bunch of garbage."

Unable to block the 1957 rights bill, Southern congressmen modified it, restricting the Justice Department's power of intervention to voting rights violations.

Colleagues rallied to Rep. Forrester's support in 1964 when he was hospitalized at the time an appropriations bill was coming up that would have put a peanut research laboratory in his home district.

In two previous years, the 5-foot-3 legislator had fought long and hard for the appropriation, but lost. Now he was about to leave Congress.

"Let's do this for Tic Forrester," said Rep. Robert L. F. Sikes (D-Fla.). "He's one of the finest little guys any of you have ever known."

"This is the only appropriation he ever asked for in his 14 years in Congress," added Rep. John L. Pilcher (D-Ga.).

The $1.6 million appropriation won a preliminary victory, but failed on the House floor, 198 to 181, as economy overcame sentiment.

Born Elijah Lewis Forrester in Lee County, Ga., Rep. Forrester lived there all his life, serving as mayor of Leesburg from 1922 to 1931 and as county attorney for nearly 10 years. He was in the Army in World War I.

At the time of his election to Congress in 1950, Rep. Forrester was solicitor general of Superior Courts of Georgia's southwestern judicial circuit.

He is survived by his wife, Thursba, two brothers and two sisters.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to his beloved wife, Thursba, Mr. Forrester is survived by two sisters, Mrs. Roy Dorminey, of Fitzgerald, Ga., and Mrs. Charles E. Williams, of Lexington, N.C.; two brothers, Rev. R. H. Forrester and Edward S. Forrester, both of Leesburg, and several nieces and nephews.

Mrs. Flynt and our children join me in extending to Mrs. Forrester and to all members of the Forrester family our condolences and heartfelt sympathy.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRINKLEY. I yield to our distinguished majority leader.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my colleague, Congressman JACK BRINKLEY, in paying tribute to the Honorable E. L. Forrester, the news of whose recent death brought a deep sadness to me, and at the same time memories of him as a good friend and a Congressman deeply devoted to the people of his district. He represented the Third District of Georgia and I represented the Third District of Oklahoma during all the years that he served in the Congress. Those of us who served here with him will always remember "Tic." During all his years in the House, he and I were very close personal friends.

During his lifetime, in his every undertaking, he was faithful and courageous in the performance of his work. These traits were characteristic of his service as a private in World War I, as a lawyer, and as city solicitor, and afterward as mayor of his home city of Leesburg. I have been informed that, as county attorney for Lee County, and afterward as solicitor general of the southwest judicial circuit, he brought fine legal ability into play in his enforcement of the law. He stood only 5 feet 3, but he stood tall in ability and integrity and every inch of the man was employed in fighting for the welfare of his constituents. As a member of the House Judiciary Committee his work was outstanding.

My sympathy for his beloved wife and family is deeper than I can find words to express. In the memories which they have of him, they possess a heritage beyond measure.

Mr. O'NEAL of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRINKLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. O'NEAL).

Mr. O'NEAL of Georgia. Mr. Speaker,

I appreciate the gentleman yielding to me, and I appreciate the fact the gentleman has obtained this special order so that we might all express our grief.

Mr. Speaker, my shock was very great when I learned of "Tic" Forrester's death. I knew him, I suppose, longer than any other man in this House—unless it might be my friend JACK FLYNT. For 15 years "Tic" Forrester and I were colleagues as district attorneys in Georgia before he came to the Congress. In that time I learned to admire and respect his ability. I found it necessary to call on him for advice on many occasions, and I found it necessary to call on him for help in holding court for me on two occasions when I was sick. I recognized in him a greatness as a prosecuting attorney, and I also recognized that greatness in him when he became a Member of this Congress.

I saw "Tic" Forrester in Atlanta about a month ago and I was impressed with the fact that he looked well, and I was delighted to come back to Washington and tell that to his many friends who had been asking about him. I do not know anybody who was the object of more inquiry by his colleagues in this Congress than "Tic" Forrester. Hardly a day passed in the last 5 years that somebody who served with him and respected him and knew him intimately did not ask how he was getting along.

As has been said by the Members who have preceded me, "Tic" was deeply patriotic and he was fiercely patriotic. He loved his country with a great devotion. There are those in this day who would want to belittle patriotism and who might even call "Tic" a chauvinist. He was distressed at many of the trends he saw taking place in this country, and he felt deeply about them. As a matter of fact he felt deeply about many things. He was always willing to do his part in any fight to obtain the good ends or to oppose these dangerous trends, as the case might be.

I am very happy that my friend, JACK FLYNT, has inserted an editorial from the Albany Herald in the RECORD. It was my plan to do so. I think it says very well what was in my heart to say.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I express my appreciation to the gentleman for letting me express my grief. My wife has asked to join me in expressing our love to Mrs. Forrester.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRINKLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. STEPHENS).

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for taking the time so we may have this opportunity to say a few words about our great friend, Tic Forrester. I had the privilege of serving with him here in this body for the first 4 years I was here. I depended upon him for a great deal of guidance, and for his good sound judgment on problems when they came up for me as a new Member of Congress.

Tic Forrester was a man who had a fine mind. There was not a better lawyer in the House of Representatives than Tic Forrester. He was an orator of the old school. He could spellbind Members of Congress as much as any one person I have known since I have been here in the last 10 years. Tic had a very keen sense of humor, but it was a sense of humor that was kind. He was never mean nor vindictive in the kind of humor in which he indulged.

Tic was an outstanding Georgia Democrat and a leader of our party in the State of Georgia. He was a warm person and a warm friend. He made friends wherever he went and in whatever capacity he served. Tic Forrester had only an eighth-grade education, but he was one of the best informed persons I have ever been associated with.

I would say Tic was a great American and his career was the ideal that many of us have talked about in the past as the ideal for an American.

We all believe the success "Tic" Forrester achieved is possible in America. "Tic" Forrester was not a person who had a high, formal education. He was not a man big in stature or imposing in presence. He was not a person who was wealthy. But he proved to the people of his generation that if one had integrity, if one had intelligence, if one had a willingness to work, he would succeed.

I should like to see a continuation of those kinds of virtues to be impressed upon the young people of our State and of our country, because "Tic" Forrester was of the mold of men who have made America great.

I thank the gentleman for permitting me to take part in this eulogy.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRINKLEY. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the able gentleman in the well for yielding to me and for allowing me to join the distinguished delegation from Georgia and our other colleagues in paying tribute to one of the most beloved men who ever sat in this House, "Tic" Forrester.

I knew "Tic" for many years. I was one of his great admirers. My home, which used to be in Tallahassee, Fla., was only about 75 miles from his home. We knew him and knew him well. Our people liked and admired him. They honored him while he served that part of the country in the House of Representatives.

"Tic" Forrester was one of those men who won his way into the hearts of all who knew him. In his passing he leaves a revered memory for what he contributed to the legislative progress of his country, for what he did as a dedicated patriot. He leaves a void in the hearts of innumerable friends who will ever honor his memory and cherish the privilege of his friendship.

I join in sending our deepest sympathy to the bereaved members of his family.

Mr. BRINKLEY. I thank the gentleman for those remarks.

As a Representative presently serving the Third District of Georgia, I hope to mark his life well and to use "Tic" Forrester as an example for my own life, and to match his dedication and zeal in some small fashion.

In conclusion I would say that "Tic" Forrester exemplified the saying: "Good words will gain you honor in the marketplace; but good deeds will gain you friends among men!"

Tic Forrester was such a man in his public and private service to his fellowman.

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who was privileged to serve with "Tic" Forrester and I shall always consider this a rich and rewarding experience. He was of that sound and patriotic mold from which great Americans come. I watched his work for years in the Congress and, in my mind, there is no question but that he fully earned recognition for great and outstanding service to our Nation.

Certainly the proceedings of the Congress were improved by his participation. He was a man of courage and a man of forthright views. I was proud of his friendship and I am proud today to say that I counted him one of my close and constant friends.

America is a better place because a man named E. L. "Tic" Forrester once lived and worked in our midst.

Mr. EVINS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I want to join my colleague, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. BRINKLEY) and others in paying a brief but sincere tribute to the memory of our friend and colleague E. L. "Tic" Forrester following his recent untimely passing.

Judge Forrester was a great gentleman and a great Congressman. He served his district, State, and Nation ably and well. He was genial, resourceful, dynamic—a faithful Representative of his people.

As a member of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, Congressman Forrester made great contributions toward the strengthening of our judicial and legal system.

Judge Forrester was a warm, friendly human being—and he will be greatly missed. I want to take this means of extending to the members of his family an expression of my deepest and most sincere sympathy in their bereavement.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, it was sad news for me when I learned of the passing of Tic Forrester on Friday, March 20. He served on the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives for 12 years. I can personally testify to his gentleness, to his unfailing good humor, to his adherence to principles in which he strongly believed. Courtesy was the hallmark of Tic Forrester. And, even in disagreement, the innate quality of the true gentleman always shone through. I had a deep affection for the man. All who knew him well did.

I recall when Tic made the decision to retire from Congress. He came to me making one plea. Not for himself. He asked that I help to see that his able staff be placed in jobs so that they would not suffer the consequences of his retirement. He was like that, giving his loyalty to those he believed merited it and he did it without reservation.

To his wife and members of his family I extend my deepest sympathy.

Mr. ANDREWS of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, the death of Elijah Lewis "Tic" Forrester last Thursday was a source of great sorrow to me. He was a good friend of mine and a former colleague who served with distinction in this great body.

For 14 years, "Tic" Forrester represented well Georgia's Third Congressional District, which borders my own district, separated only by the great Chattahoochee River. Because of this, we shared mutual interests in many matters relating to our respective districts.

"Tic" worked hard and long for this Nation and the good people of his district. His every action reflected his unbending honesty and sincerity.

The dedication and vigor with which "Tic" Forrester approached his congressional duties was an accurate reflection of the record that he had made before coming to Washington.

Born on a farm near Leesburg, Ga., "Tic" worked hard to become an attorney. Thereafter, he served as solicitor of the city court of Leesburg, mayor of Leesburg, county attorney for Lee County, solicitor-general of the southwestern judicial circuit, and finally U.S. Representative for the Third Congressional District of Georgia. Clearly, "Tic" was not one to let grass grow under his feet.

In the House, "Tic" gave his very capable service to the Judiciary Committee, on which he served until his retirement from Congress at the end of the 88th Congress.

In the passing of E. L. "Tic" Forrester, Georgia loses one of its outstanding citizens, and I, and many others in this body, have lost a dear friend.

I extend my most heartfelt sympathies to his lovely wife and fine family.

Mr. HALEY. Mr. Speaker, it was a very sad day when we were told that our dear friend and former colleague, E. L. "Tic" Forrester, had passed away.

When I came to the Congress in 1953, "Tic" Forrester was one of the first Members of the House of Representatives to greet me. As was his generous habit, he was willing to share knowledge with the newcomers, to give them his advice and counsel. He was helpful to many of us.

We became good friends and remained so until his death.

"Tic" Forrester was an able and effective legislator. He served his native Georgia and our Nation well.

We lost an outstanding Member of the Congress when he retired. The absence of his wise counsel was felt by many. And now, his many friends mourn his passing.

Mrs. Haley joins me in sending to Mrs. Forrester our deepest sympathy and kindest thoughts.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, the center aisle divides us as to our political party affiliation and frequently divides us on legislative issues. But there is no center aisle in the matter of friendships. I have many times said that most rewarding to me in my service in this body has been the friendships I have been able to make.

With the passing of "Tic" Forrester, who served here from the Third District of Georgia from 1951 to 1964, I have lost a very fine friend—one of the best any man could have. He was small in physical stature but he was big in heart and intellect.

To say that he served here with distinction is not to say enough. He made a contribution to the work of this House which will stand as a lasting monument to his service, not only to his district and his party but to our country. I look upon "Tic" Forrester as one of the ablest lawyers to serve in the House.

With the passing of "Tic" Forrester our country has lost a great American. I have lost a real friend.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend my sympathy to the family of a former colleague and friend, E. L. "Tic" Forrester. I had the pleasure of serving with him on the Judiciary Committee and I knew him to have been a sincere and dedicated representative of the people while in Congress. His passing is a great loss to those who knew him and to all those whom he served.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I was greatly saddened to learn of the death on March 19 of E. L. "Tic" Forrester, a distinguished and able former Member of this body, with whom I was proud to serve in the 87th and 88th Congresses.

Tic Forrester represented the people of the Third District of Georgia in an exemplary manner and presented his views with vigor and distinction. Although he was a veteran of more than 10 years' service when I became a Member of this body, he graciously offered me his friendship and counsel. Tic was as decent, kind, and entertaining a person as one could ever meet, and I feel privileged to be able to pay tribute to him today. His passing is a loss to his family, his State, and the Nation.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I commend the gentleman from Georgia for taking this special order to pay tribute to the life and character of the late E. L. Forrester.

I was a staff member during Mr. Forrester's tenure here, and it was my good fortune to know him and work with him on various matters.

I knew him to be a dedicated public servant, ever conscious of the needs and views of his constituency.

He was a kind man; a gentle man; a moral man.

Mr. Forrester held strong opinions. He was an able advocate in debate.

This House and this great Nation are better off because of Tic's service in this body.

I extend sympathy to his survivors.

Mr. ROONEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I sadly join with my colleagues in paying tribute to a fine gentleman, the late Honorable E. L. "Tic" Forrester who for 10 years represented the people of Georgia's Third Congressional District. "Tic" was a genuine person, a man I liked very much. We disagreed many times, to be sure, but disagreement does not mean that one cannot like a person who has principles and sticks to them, popular or not. "Tic" made many friends in his years here and we all miss him. To his wife and brothers and sisters I extend my deepest sympathy in their great loss.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may be granted 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the life, character, and service of the late Honorable "Tic" Forrester.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE CHARLOTTE SCHOOL CASE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. JONAS) is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Speaker, the Charlotte-Mecklenburg County school system is the largest in the Carolinas. It ranks 43d in size in the United States. There are approximately 84,000 students enrolled in this consolidated system. It is administered by a board of education composed of nine members elected by the people. There are 107 schools in the system. Approximately 71 percent of the students are white and 29 percent black.

A desegregation suit was filed against the board of education by certain local citizens in 1965. The board filed a desegregation plan which abolished all aspects of a dual school system and provided that students should be assigned to schools on the basis of residency within geographic zones without regard to race or color. This plan was approved by the Federal District Judge sitting in Charlotte and his decision was affirmed by the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals.

In 1968 a motion was filed in the cause asking for further relief and alleging discrimination in teachers' salaries, facilities, and so forth. This motion was heard and considered by the present district judge who succeeded the one who heard the original action, the latter having been elevated to the Fourth Circuit Court bench.

On April 23, 1969—less than a year ago—the present district judge found certain facts about the Charlotte-Mecklenburg school system and based upon these facts held that:

No racial discrimination or inequality is found in the following:

The use of Federal funds for special aid to the disadvantaged; the use of mobile classrooms; the quality of the school buildings and equipment; coaching of athletics; parent-teacher association contributions and activities; school fees; school lunches; library books; elective courses; and individual evaluation of students.

In the April 23, 1969, order the district judge, who on February 5, 1970, subsequently entered the order requiring massive busing to achieve racial balance in the schools, said the following about the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education:

They have achieved a degree and volume of desegregation of schools apparently unsurpassed in these parts, and have exceeded the performance of any school board whose actions have been reviewed in appellate court decisions. . . ."

The district court placed great reliance upon the holding of the Supreme Court in Green against New Kent County, and it should be noted that the Green case was decided in May of 1968, nearly a full year before the court in Charlotte had complimented the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education so highly as shown in the above quotation from his order.

In 1968 the Supreme Court had stated in Green against New Kent County that it is the school board's responsibility—

To achieve a system of determining admission to the public schools on a non-racial basis.

The following is quoted from the decision in that case:

The obligation of the District Courts, as it always has been, is to assess the effectiveness of a proposed plan in achieving desegregation. There is no universal answer to complex problems of desegregation; there is obviously no one plan that will do the job in every case. The matter must be assessed in light of the circumstances present and the options available in each instance. It is incumbent upon the school board to establish that its proposed plan promises meaningful and immediate progress toward disestablishing state-imposed segregation. It is incumbent upon the District Court to weigh that claim in light of the facts at hand and in light of any alternatives which may be shown as feasible and more promising in their effectiveness. Where the court finds the board to be acting in good faith and the proposed plan to have real prospects for dismantling the state-imposed dual system 'at the earliest practicable date,' then the plan may be said to provide effective relief. Of course, where other, more promising courses of action are open to the board, that may indicate a lack of good faith; and at the least its places a heavy burden upon the board to explain its preference for an apparently less effective method. Moreover, whatever plan is adopted will require evaluation in practice, and the court should retain jurisdiction until it is clear that state-imposed segregation has been completely removed. See No. 805, Raney v. Board of Education, post, at p. 5. (Emphasis added).

After having praised the board of education for having "achieved a degree and volume of desegregation of schools apparently unsurpassed in these parts and having exceeded the performance of any school board whose actions have been reviewed in appellate court decisions," the court ordered the board to design a new plan. The board did so several times only to have all of them, in effect, rejected. The court then appointed one of plaintiff's expert witnesses from Rhode Island as a consultant to come to Charlotte to design a plan.

On February 1, 1970, the board of education submitted a final plan utilizing a computer to achieve a maximum racial mix of approximately 72 percent white and 29 percent black in each school where possible by restructuring attendance lines.

The plan of the court appointed consultant incorporated part of the board's plan but went far beyond it by pairing 10 predominantly black schools with 23 predominantly white schools which will require massive busing to accomplish. The court adapted part of the board's plan and part of the plan prepared by the consultant but the controversy arises over the part of the plan designed by the consultant. The court entered its order on February 5, 1970.

Although the district judge stated in his February 5, 1970, order that it was not based upon any requirement of "racial balance," the order seems to require the achieving of racial balance in all the schools as will appear from the following quoted paragraphs of the order he entered:

That pupils of all grades be assigned in such a way that as nearly as practicable the various schools at various grade levels have about the same proportion of black and white students.

That its geographic zones are used in making school assignments, the parts of a zone need not be contiguous.

That the defendants maintain a continuing control over the race of children in each school, just as was done for many decades before Brown v. Board of Education, and maintain the racial make-up of each school (including any new and any re-opened schools) to prevent any school from becoming racially identifiable.

To comply with the Court's order, the Charlotte-Mecklenburg County Board of Education contends it would be required to provide transportation for 23,000 additional students, including 5,000 innercity blacks to be cross-bused with 5,000 suburban whites. Students in paired schools would have to travel approximately 15 miles through the congested area of the city and will average 2½ hours each day in transit.

It is contended by the school board that the transportation of 23,000 additional students would require 527 buses and cost approximately $3 million with an annual average operating cost of approximately $1,200,000. I am informed that it will be impossible to obtain that many buses by the deadline imposed by the Court for the transfer of students.

The Court imposed the following "deadlines" upon the board of education to completely implement its order:

Grades 1–6 by April 1, 1970.

Grades 7, 8, and 9 by May 4, 1970.

Grades 10 and 11 by May 4, 1970.

Grade 12 may remain in present school until end of year.

The Supreme Court has interpreted the 14th amendment to the U.S. Constitution as requiring the admission of students to public schools on a nonracial basis, and as forbidding their exclusion from any school on account of race. In a very late decision on this issue the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, in the Statesville case, said:

No school district may continue to operate a dual system based on race. Each must function as a unitary system within which no person is to be excluded from any school on the basis of race. (emphasis added)

With all due respect, I must say that in my opinion the order of the district judge now under discussion requires the massive busing of schoolchildren to accomplish exactly what the Supreme Court, and the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit have said must not be done; namely, the assignment of thousands of Charlotte-Mecklenburg schoolchildren to particular schools on the basis of their race. The order in question would, in my judgment, violate the constitutional rights of white and black children by excluding them from their neighborhood schools solely on account of their race.

If the 14th amendment to the Constitution of the United States requires the desegregation of public schools, as has repeatedly been held by the Supreme Court, there can be no doubt about the responsibility of Congress to enforce the provisions of the 14th amendment by appropriate legislation. Section 5 of that amendment reads as follows:

The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

It seems to me that there could not be a more specific grant of constitutional authority to Congress to enforce the provisions of the 14th amendment.

Congress undertook to discharge this constitutional authority by legislating on this subject in the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Title IV of that act deals with the desegregation of public education. Section 401 of that act defines certain terms used in it. Section 401(b) reads as follows:

"Desegregation" means the assignment of students to public schools and within such schools without regard to their race, color, religion, or national origin, but "desegregation" shall not mean the assignment of students to public schools in order to overcome racial imbalance.

Section 407 of title IV of that act confers authority on the Attorney General of the United States to institute desegregation suits, and after spelling out the conditions under which that authority might be exercised, the following proviso was added:

Provided that nothing herein shall empower any official or court of the United States to issue any order seeking to achieve a racial balance in any school by requiring the transportation of pupils or students from one school to another or from one school district to another in order to achieve such racial balance, or otherwise enlarge the existing power of the court to insure compliance with constitutional standards.

The district judge who entered the Charlotte order on February 5, 1970, never mentioned the Civil Rights Act of 1964 in his order. Perhaps the reason he did not do so is because the Charlotte case was not brought by the Attorney General, nor was it instituted by any agency or department of the Federal Government. It was brought by private individuals and their suit was based on the Constitution and particularly the 14th amendment.

But I would respectfully point out that the above provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 have never been repealed, have never been declared unconstitutional, and so far as I know the authority of the Congress of the United States to define what is "desegregation" in public education has never been questioned. I believe Congress had a right to define that term and unless and until that definition is removed or stricken down, it would seem to me to be the law of the land as much as any other legislation enacted by Congress.

While widespread disapproval of the February 5, 1970, district court order has been voiced by citizens of Charlotte and Mecklenburg County, the people of that community are not anarchists or revolutionaries. They have not advocated that court orders be defied. There has never been any substantial resistance in Charlotte to the integration of the public schools or of public accommodations. The public schools for years have been open to all children regardless of their race or color. Blacks have been free to vote throughout that community for years and currently a Negro serves on the Charlotte City Council, having been elected by the people of an electorate in which whites far outnumber blacks. The people of Charlotte-Mecklenburg County and their board of education well deserve the high praise voiced by the district judge on April 23, 1969.

Having accepted with good grace desegregation of the public schools as that term was defined by Congress, the people are naturally bewildered and disturbed by a court order that, for the purpose of achieving racial balance, will require the massive busing of thousands of students, some of whom will spend 2 to 3 hours each day on a bus when they could use that time to better advantage at their studies or at school.

When I heard about that order and received many letters and telegrams from Charlotte protesting it, I discussed the situation with the President of the United States and urged him to issue a statement clarifying his position and that of his administration on the subject of compulsory busing to achieve racial balance. Two days following that conversation, the President had his office issue the following statement:

> The President has consistently opposed, and still opposes, compulsory busing of school children to achieve racial balance. This practice is prohibited by the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The Administration is in full accord with the provisions of the statute.
> School desegregation plans prepared by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare on request by school boards or pursuant to court order will be directed to the greatest possible extent toward preserving rather than destroying the neighborhood school concept. It is the President's firm judgment that in carrying out the law and court decisions in respect to desegregation of schools, the primary objective must always be the preservation of quality education for the school children of America.

In his March 24, 1970, statement outlining his position on the subject of school desegregation, President Nixon reasserted his support of neighborhood schools and his opposition to compulsory busing to achieve racial balance. He also said that in devising local compliance plans—

> Primary weight should be given to the considered judgment of local school boards—provided they act in good faith and within constitutional limits.

I also discussed the Charlotte case several times with Secretary Finch of HEW. Following these conversations Secretary Finch has made two forthright public statements dealing with compulsory busing, and in both of them he referred to the Charlotte case as requiring massive busing which he said he did not believe would promote quality education.

The first Finch statement was made on February 17, 1970, in testimony before the House Rules Committee, and the following is quoted from that testimony:

> The most extreme recent example has been the Charlotte case and the Los Angeles case. Neither HEW nor Justice were involved in those cases. The court chose to go far beyond anything that the law had ever imposed up to that point by saying that not only are you going to bus but the court laid out the precise proportions giving the total ratios of races within the full district and said each school within that district had to meet those ratios.
> Now, once you get to that point you obviously have to figure how you are going to transport those students. . . . Massive amounts of money will have to be spent . . . We do not believe that is educationally sound because it is not the best allocation of resources.

The second Finch statement was made on March 1, 1970, when he was being interviewed on the Metromedia News program in Washington, D.C. The following quotations are taken from an article published by the Washington Post on March 2, 1970, reporting that Secretary Finch said in that interview:

> Then you have problems like Charlotte . . . which I think are totally unrealistic, because they say that you shall take the percentages in the district as a whole and apply those and force on each district—or each school within that district.
> And in the case of Charlotte, they have to buy 400 new buses . . . when you have that kind of a situation, that's not the best of your resources because you're desperately trying to keep the doors open, to pay faculty, to pay janitors. But beyond that it's not the best educational experience, because to haul young children for an hour or more, across long distances . . . means they can't get any tutoring after school, the parents can't—have great difficulty—in getting to the teacher to talk about their child.

The Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education had, as was found by the district judge in his April 23, 1969, order, achieved a remarkable degree and volume of desegregation of schools. All of the schools in the system are open to all students regardless of race or color. No student is denied admission to any school on account of his race or color. Despite this exemplary record, which had been achieved without resistance from the white community, the district judge entered his February 5, 1970, order requiring massive busing of thousands of students to achieve a racial balance in each school.

The board of education appealed that order to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals. After the appeal was taken, the district judge modified his order dated February 5, 1970.

The Charlotte News reports that the effect of the modification is to require the school board only to provide transportation to children whose "reassignment" is required by the order rather than the original requirement to provide transportation to all students whose "attendance" is required in a particular school to comply with the order. It has not been determined how many additional students will have to be bused under this modification. The Charlotte News reports that the judge estimates that this number will be reduced from 23,000 to from 10,000 to 14,000. But the chairman of the board of education says the number will still be close to 23,000.

It became necessary for the board of education to apply to and obtain from the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals an order staying the implementation of the order issued by the district judge because the latter specifically declined to grant a stay pending an appeal and ordered that immediate steps be taken to comply with his order. The stay ordered by the circuit court applies to that part of the February 5, 1970, order which requires cross busing.

The plaintiffs in the Charlotte case filed a motion in the U.S. Supreme Court asking the Court to vacate the order of the fourth circuit court staying the district court order. On March 16 the Supreme Court denied that motion, leaving the stay order in effect.

It is important, I think, that the confusion over what is desegregation be cleared up. District courts are not uniform in their decisions. So we have the spectacle of a district judge in North Carolina ordering massive busing to achieve racial balance in all schools and district judges in neighboring States declining to do so. The law of the land should be made clear and it should apply in all of the States.

I undertook to put Congress on record again in this field by offering an amendment to the vetoed HEW appropriation bill. I was able to persuade the House Committee on Appropriations, on which I am a senior member, to accept my amendment. An effort was made to strike the amendment when the bill was considered in the House of Representatives, but that effort failed. Then the bill with my amendment in it went over to the Senate where a similar effort was made to persuade the Senate Appropriation Committee to knock my amendment out of the bill. That effort also failed. However, when the bill was considered in the Senate itself a final effort to eliminate the amendment succeeded. Following is the text of my amendment:

> Sec. 410. No part of the funds contained in this Act shall be used to provide, formulate, carry out, or implement, any plan which would deny to any student, because of his or her race or color, the right or privilege of attending any public school of his or her choice as selected by his or her parent or guardian.

Various bills have been introduced in the House and Senate undertaking to bring some uniformity out of the chaos that now exists and to state in unequivocal and unambiguous language the law of the land on this subject.

Since I am opposed to compulsory busing to achieve racial balance in the schools and am equally opposed to the assignment of students to particular schools on account of their race or color, and because I do not interpret the Constitution as either requiring or authorizing such action, I introduced a bill in the House of Representatives to prohibit compulsory busing of schoolchildren and to adopt freedom of choice as a national policy. My bill simply adds a new section to the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and reads as follows:

Sect. 411. Nothing in this Act shall authorize or require any school board, or empower any court to order any school board, to assign any student to a public school or to transport any student away from the school of his choice, on the basis of his race, color, religion, or national origin.

I frankly do not see how anyone could oppose my bill because it seeks to do exactly what the Supreme Court has been saying should be done ever since Brown against the Board of Education—prohibit the assignment of students to public schools on the basis of their race or color.

My bill, which is number H.R. 15751, is now pending before the House Committee on the Judiciary. Those interested in helping bring this bill to the House for a vote might properly join me in urging that committee to report it out so that the House of Representatives can act on it.

The purpose of my bill is to provide certainty where now there is uncertainty. This confusion is intolerable and must be resolved. Presently local school boards do not know what the law is on desegregation. Congress has defined that term but some judges refuse to abide by Congress' definition. So Congress should try again and make the law on this subject clear and unequivocal. This is a responsibility Congress should assume and it must fulfill its responsibility to settle this controversy once and for all—the responsibility delegated to it by section 5 of the 14th amendment. Congress should not delegate that responsibility to another branch of Government and should not leave it to chance.

TWENTY-ONE BILLION FOR HEALTH

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I have taken this special order for the purpose of setting the record straight. Neither the Congress nor the President have been or will be stingy when it comes to providing funds for the health of the people of this Nation.

A thorough scrutiny of the Federal budget for fiscal 1971 shows that approximately $21¼ billion has been recommended for health programs. This compares with about $18¾ billion for the current fiscal year.

These huge sums do not include the bulk of expenditures for the health requirements of the Armed Forces, as the budget lumps such spending with other items. That we in the Congress want our fighting men to have the best possible medical care goes without saying.

Most of the spending for health comes under the jurisdiction of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Veterans' Administration, and the Civil Service Commission. Comparatively minor amounts are expended by the Appalachian regional development programs, the Canal Zone government, and the Departments of State, Justice, and Transportation.

We hear a lot of talk to the effect that inflation is to blame for the increased costs of these programs. I am convinced that it is at least partly the other way around. When the Federal Government pours out in excess of $21 billion for health alone in just 12 months, there is bound to be an increase in the cost of physicians' services, the price of medicines and drugs, and the expense of hospitalization.

During the next few months, the Committee on Appropriations, on which I am privileged to serve, and the House of Representatives will have to decide on just how much we want to provide for the many health programs that are operated by the Federal Government. As we think about the physical health of the American people, we must also think about their fiscal health. If they are going to be able to provide the money needed to take care of their physical health, they must also be able to enjoy sound fiscal health.

If we balance the budget for the coming fiscal year, thus helping to check inflation, we will make it possible for the taxpayers to get more for the Government's health dollar and thus help to preserve both the physical health and the fiscal health of all of us.

The tabulation follows:

The laws administered by the Food and Drug Administration are designed to protect the public against dangerous, misbranded, and adulterated foods, drugs, therapeutic devices, cosmetics, and other products, including pesticides, poisons, toys, and hazardous household substances.

Foods. Grants. Research and training grants are awarded to State agencies, to universities, and to qualified nonprofit institutions for studies of contamination of foods, including milk and shellfish.

Direct operations. Within this activity the Food and Drug Administration conducts intramural and extramural research, sets products standards, reviews petitions and establishes tolerances for food additives, defines good manufacturing practices, inspects manufacturing and distribution establishments, collects and analyzes samples of marketed foods to ensure that the final product is safe, wholesome, and properly labeled, and takes necessary regulatory actions.

The increase requested will fund additional self-certification efforts and expanded research on drug residues in foods and on the safety of food additives.

Drugs and devices. The agency evaluates all new drugs proposed for experimental testing in humans and again before they are sold to the public. After a a drug or device is marketed, the agency reviews reports of adverse reactions, conducts extramural and intramural studies to detect new problems, inspects manufacturing and distribution establishments, collects and analyzes samples of marketed drugs, and takes necessary regulatory actions.

The increase requested will provide for review of an increasing volume of new-drug submissions, collection of additional epidemiological data, and a preliminary survey of the device industry.

Product safety. Grants. Research grants are awarded to universities and to other institutions for the study of accidental poisonings, burns, and other injuries related to the use of potentially hazardous products.

Direct operations. The agency collects and evaluates epidemiological data on injuries involving hazardous products, conducts intramural and extramural studies, inspects manufacturing and distribution establishments, sponsors tests of products that appear unusually dangerous, and takes necessary regulatory actions.

The requested increase will fund the collection and evaluation of additional epidemiological data as well as partial implementation of the Child Protection and Toy Safety Act.

Pesticides. Grants. Research grants are awarded to State agencies, to universities, and to other institutions for the study of health hazards associated with the use of pesticides.

Direct operations. The agency inspects food firms and collects and analyzes product samples to ensure that foods do not contain unsafe levels of pesticide residues, evaluates all pesticide labels before they are registered by the Department of Agriculture, and conducts research on the health effects of pesticides.

The requested increase will support long-term animal studies on pesticides that have already proven to be hazardous in large dosages.

Program direction and management services. This activity includes the agency's executive and administrative functions: the establishment of policy, the allocation and control of resources, the evaluation of performance, and the support of the agency's operating units in such areas as financial management, personnel, training, and facilities management.

The Department has the responsibility for the investigation of causes of air pollution, the determination of its effects upon life and property, the development of effective means of prevention and control, the development of air quality criteria, and direct Federal enforcement. The Clean Air Act provides for an approach to these problems through: the solution of significant technical problems through research, development, and demonstration; and the application of available technology and control techniques, through a variety of coordinated Federal-State abatement and control measures.

The act places emphasis on regional control of air pollution, primarily as a State responsibility, with requirements for Federal action in regional designation and assistance in the development of State standards. A program of basic and applied research, accelerated development of improved emission control technology, grants-in-aid to air pollution control agencies, direct Federal abatement in specified areas, technical services to States and local agencies, review of State standards and plans, and a training program designed to provide competencies necessary to cope with the complex problem of air pollution, serves to carry out these approaches. The program is accelerated by extensive use of other organizations, both public and private, through grants and contracts.

Abatement and control. Control program grants are made to regional, State, and local air pollution control agencies on a matching basis for the purpose of establishing, developing, improving, and maintaining programs for the prevention and control of air pollution. This activity also includes direct Federal abatement in interstate and intrastate areas, enforcement of Federal automotive vehicle emission standards, technical assistance to States and local governments, the Federal facilities pollution control program, and implementation of the emergency episode provisions of the Clean Air Act. During 1971, emphasis will be directed at coordinating and assisting Federal, State, and local efforts in establishing effective control programs in cooperation with the designation of air quality control regions.

Research, development, and demonstrations. Grants and contracts. Grants are awarded to universities and other nonprofit institutions to conduct research into air pollution problems. Contracts relating to fuels and vehicles are used to accelerate research and development into new and improved methods, having industrywide application, for the prevention and control of air pollution resulting from the combustion of fuels. Special emphasis will be placed on development of technology for the control of sulfur oxides.

Direct operations. This activity includes research into the nature and extent of air pollution; its transport and atmospheric behavior; the effects on humans, other biological systems, property, and the atmosphere itself; and improvement in means for controlling pollution. The 1971 program will continue ongoing research in the control of vehicle emissions and sulfur oxides and the development of air quality criteria.

Manpower training. Training and technical personnel for Federal, State, and local government research and control operations is carried out through this activity. Special emphasis is placed on recruitment of technical personnel and short-term training for State and local agencies. Training grants are also awarded to universities to support the development and improvement of graduate-level air pollution curricula and to provide student stipends. Fellowship awards support individual postgraduate training in air pollution research and control activities.

Program direction and management services. Overall executive direction and supervision of Federal air pollution activities and formulation of program and administrative policies are carried out under this activity. Direction, supervision, and coordination of administrative services, including financial and personnel management, general services, and facilities planning are also provided under this activity.

This appropriation supports a national program for the prevention and control of environmental hazards and health problems in order that man may more efficiently deal with his environment. Particular attention is devoted to solid waste management, occupational safety and health, radiological health, water hygiene, and community environmental management which includes human ecological systems, urban housing hygiene, and the special environmental problems of the Arctic, Appalachia, and other regions. These activities are carried out through research, training, and fellowship grants to universities, nonprofit institutions, and individuals; demonstration and planning grants to State, interstate, and local agencies in support of solid waste management programs; and direct Federal operations.

Solid waste management. The solid wastes program is designed to insure proper health protection and improved solid wastes disposal practices and technology through research, training, demonstration, development, and systems planning. Technical assistance is provided to States and communities throughout the Nation to improve solid waste management practices through application of existing technology and management techniques and through utilization of improved methods and equipment for collecting, processing, recycling, and disposing of solid wastes. In 1971 special emphasis will be placed on finding ways to insure that the costs of solid waste management are borne by those who generate the wastes.

Occupational health. Research and training is conducted and assistance provided to Federal, State, and local agencies, and to industry for prevention and control of occupational hazards and diseases. The 1971 increase will provide for the development of criteria for standards to control the health problems related to cotton dust, coal dust, uranium radiation, and noise.

Radiological health. This activity has the responsibility for conducting a national program for the control and prevention of radiological hazards to public health, involving research on the sources, levels, and effects of radiation. Criteria and standards are developed and enforced as a means of protecting the public. A training program is utilized to provide the competencies needed in the expanding area of radiation protection and control. Technical assistance is provided to State and local agencies to aid in the development of their own radiation programs. In 1971 increased attention will be given to the protection of the consumer from hazardous radiation from electronic products.

Community environmental management. This program directs its efforts to managing environmental conditions associated with man's home, neighborhood, metropolitan area, and regional complexities. Assistance is provided to communities through technical consultation, training, demonstrations, establishment of criteria for planning healthful environments for urban areas and the development and application of health standards related to housing.

Water hygiene. The responsibility of this program is to assure that the quality of the Nation's waters intended for drinking, recreation, and other human contact is maintained at safe levels. Through research, training, technical assistance, and standards development, guidance is provided to States and local communities for safeguarding the sanitary quality of water supplies.

Program direction and management services. The Office of the Commissioner of the Environmental Control Administration directs and coordinates the programs of the Administration and furnishes centralized management services. This is accomplished by formulation of administrative and program policies, coordination of research and development activities, and dissemination of information; and provision of management services related to program planning, legislative matters, financial and personnel management, and procurement.

St. Elizabeths Hospital provides treatment and care for the mentally ill who are either beneficiaries of the Federal Government or residents of the District of Columbia. Programs of the hospital are financed by Federal appropriations covering treatment and care of Federal beneficiaries and by reimbursements made to the hospital for services rendered other patient groups, principally residents of the District of Columbia. During 1969, St. Elizabeths Hospital was reorganized as the National Center for Mental Health Services, Training, and Research. The goal of the National Center is to provide a model demonstration of the conversion of a large mental hospital into a modern, community-based mental health facility, develop a coordinated and intensified program for the provision of trained mental health personnel, and accelerate research efforts to provide a better understanding of mental illness.

The functions of the National Center are implemented under three divisions. Each division is represented by one of the three activity headings set forth below:

Clinical and community services. This activity consists of the St. Elizabeths Hospital—Division of Clinical and Community Services. It provides all of the therapeutic and rehabilitative programs of the National Center, maintenance of buildings, procurement of supplies and materials, and provision of necessary administrative services. The hospital is cooperating with the District of Columbia in the establishment and operation of a community mental health center on its campus, in order to serve the residents of the major southeast portion of the District.

Training and education. During 1969, a portion of the financial support for the National Center's Division of Intramural Training was derived from this activity, with the remainder of the program funded under the manpower development activity of the mental health appropriation. The function of the Division is to provide multidisciplinary clinical training for professional and ancillary personnel engaged in or interested in mental health activities. Effective in 1970, all of the funding for the Division of Intramural Training is being derived from the Mental Health appropriation.

Research. During 1969, this activity supported the Division of Clinical Research of the National Center which carries out coordinated research programs for the purpose of obtaining a better understanding of the causes of mental disorders, and of the factors bearing upon their development, treatment, and possible prevention. Effective in 1970, the funding for the Division of Clinical Research was transferred to the research activity of the Mental Health appropriation.

The National Center for Health Services Research and Development has been established as the principal agency within the Department to improve the organization, delivery, and financing of health services by stimulating and supporting research, research and development, demonstrations, and related training. The National Center is focusing on national priority problems in health services such as rising costs, unequal distribution and utilization of health services, inadequate methods for planning and decisionmaking, and shortages of professional personnel. To make progress in solving these problems, both basic studies and action-oriented research and development are essential. To increase the number of people and institutions capable of conducting such studies and projects, research training and the development of research capabilities in academic and community organizations are supported.

Studies, training, and systems development. Grants and contracts. Funds are provided to carry out large-scale research and development projects for the specific purpose of increasing the availability and controlling costs of health services. Of the budgeted increase, $10,000,000 will be used to initiate the development of effective health care delivery systems at regional, State, and local levels. The experiments, under the supervision of the National Center, will be conducted jointly with regional medical programs and comprehensive health planning agencies in selected places throughout the Nation. The experiments should result in a number of working models of health care system which could be utilized, with appropriate modifications, elsewhere in the Nation.

Basic studies. Grants and contracts are awarded to academic and other research organizations to conduct analyses of economic, social, and technological factors which have a basic effect on the organization, financing, and utilization of health services.

Resource development. Grants and contracts are awarded to academic institutions for the development of health services research and development resources.

Training and fellowships. Grants are awarded to institutions and to qualified scholars for supporting research training programs in the health services field.

Direct operations. This subactivity provides staff with the operational capability for both extramural and intramural research programs. It permits utilization of Federal direct health services and federally funded service programs, for the development, testing, and demonstration of improved health services techniques. It determines the strength of the research in such areas as cost containment, economic analysis, the improvement of health service institutions, technology, and community health services systems. The 1971 increase will provide for additional specialized staff to concentrate on the above areas, provide consultative services associated with the Center's program, and develop research training programs in universities and other appropriate settings.

Program direction and management services. This activity includes top management and staff services for the National Center, including central management services.

This appropriation encompasses a comprehensive nationwide program directed to improving the quality, quantity, effectiveness, and availability of health services in all settings. This will be accomplished through the following:

Partnership for health grants. Planning. Formula grants for comprehensive health planning. These grants are awarded to States based on population and per capita income to provide a framework in which health needs and resources can be analyzed and alternative courses of action recommended. Agencies have been established in each of the 50 States, the District of Columbia, and five territories. Most State planning agencies have completed the organizational phase of their activities and have become involved in substantive planning and priority setting. The studies by the planning agencies provide a basis upon which future expenditures of health resources in the State can be rationalized. Initial areas of emphasis include health manpower, health information systems, health facilities, and health services to the poor.

Project grants for areawide comprehensive health planning. Through project grants to public or private nonprofit groups to establish an areawide health planning agency, a community has the opportunity to develop a coherent and efficient areawide health system. Such groups as private health practitioners, hospitals, medical schools, voluntary health agencies, local governments, consumers, and specialized planning groups now work through an institutionalized forum to reach agreement on local priorities for facility, service, and manpower development.

Project grants for training, studies, and demonstrations for comprehensive health planning. These grants provide support for both long-term and short-term training of health planners. Long-term academic programs are being supported which will train students in such areas as basic concepts of health, planning theories and techniques, urban sociology, and social problems in society today. The grants also support demonstration projects for the development of citizen representatives to serve effectively on health planning bodies.

Formula grants to States for health services. These bloc grants to State health and mental health authorities assist the States in attacking those health problems they consider of most immediate importance. The State plan for carrying out these programs must be in accord with the overall plans developed by the State comprehensive health planning agency. At least 15 percent of the funds must support mental health activities. Additionally, 70 percent of all funds must be made available for the provision of health services at the local level. Several States are placing major emphasis on expansion of their home health services, another describes its major priority as the need to expand services related to family planning, environmental health, and dental health. Still another State depicts a redirection of funds into such areas as drug abuse and suicide prevention. An increasing number of States are developing effective systems for making funds available to local officials and voluntary agencies for the support of health programs at the community level.

A review of the 1970 State plans for tuberculosis control activities shows increased financial support, due to the expanded Federal grant and the shift of program focus from Federal to State responsibility.

Up to 1 percent of the amount appropriated for formula grants may be used for evaluation of programs supported by the grants.

Project grants for health services development. These grants provide support for activities to meet special regionally or nationally determined needs. The highest priority is the support of comprehensive health service programs providing primary care and a broad range of ambulatory services. An intensive nationwide rubella immunization program initiated in 1970 will be continued. Grants will be awarded to support projects in other areas such as specialized health components supportive of community health programs, rodent control, health activities in model cities, and disease control programs. Up to 1 percent of the amount appropriated for project grants may be used for evaluation of programs supported by the grants.

Migrant health program. Grants are made to finance part of the costs of establishing family health services clinics, to provide short-term hospitalization, and for other projects to improve the health services and health condition of agricultural migrant workers and their families. Through direct operations, the program provides technical assistance to migrant health projects and conducts studies vital to the effectiveness of the program.

Standard-setting and resources development. This activity provides for development of specialized programs in comprehensive health and medical care administration, including the professional health aspects of title XVIII of the Social Security Act and technical assistance for the migrant health grant program. Also included are the activities related to the promotion, consultation, and assistance in the development of the group practice concept.

Program direction and management services. This activity provides for overall executive direction and planning and for administrative management. It also includes analysis and evaluation of program activities and the Community Profile Data Center.

Maternal and child health. This program has as its major goal the provision of health services to mothers and children especially in rural areas or areas suffering from severe economic distress. Through assistance to States, localities, and nonprofit groups it directs primary attention to: reducing infant mortality and otherwise promoting the health of mothers and children; and locating, diagnosing, and treating children who are suffering from crippling or handicapping illnesses.

Infant mortality. Grants to States. Formula grants are made to States for health services as noted below. One half of the amount appropriated must be matched by the States and the remainder is distributed in proportion to financial need of the States, except that not more than 12½ percent of the appropriation may be used for special project grants.

Maternal and child health services. Funds are used by States for the extension and improvement of health services for mothers and children.

Crippled children's services. States utilize funds for casefinding, diagnosis, and treatment of children who are crippled or who are suffering from conditions leading to crippling.

Project grants. Grants are made to specified agencies to meet up to 75 percent of the costs of comprehensive health care in three major areas, as follows:

Maternity and infant care. State and local health agencies or other public or nonprofit private organizations operate projects to help reduce infant and maternal mortality and the incidence of mental retardation and other handicapping conditions associated with childbearing. The existing projects are also serving a demonstrated need to improve the quality and quantity of maternity services to women in low-income areas.

Health of school and preschool children. State or local agencies, medical schools, and teaching hospitals conduct comprehensive health care projects for children and youth, particularly in areas where low-income families are concentrated.

Dental health of children. State and local agencies and other public or nonprofit groups are eligible to conduct comprehensive dental care projects for children.

Research and training. Training. Grants are made to public or nonprofit institutions of higher learning including university-affiliated mental retardation centers for training personnel for health care and related services for mothers and children. Research. The focus of this program is to support research which shows promise of substantial contribution to the advancement of maternal and child health or crippled children's services and to study the effectiveness of such programs through research grants, contracts, or jointly financed cooperative arrangements.

Program direction and management services. This activity provides for executive direction, planning, and general management of the maternal and child health program.

Family planning activities. One of the most effective measures for reducing infant mortality is through the provision of family planning services which enable women to decide the number and spacing of children they wish to have. Thus, the Child Health Act of 1967 specified that not less than 6 percent of the amount appropriated for child health shall be available for family planning. In 1971 about 19 percent of the total maternal and child health appropriation for grants and contracts will be used for this purpose. Emphasis on voluntary family planning will be through the State grant program for maternal and child health services and the special family planning project grant program.

Project grants. Grants are made to State and local health agencies or other public or nonprofit private organizations to meet up to 75 percent of the costs of projects to provide family planning services to needy women who may wish such services.

Project contracts. Contracts will support training and studies to develop new and improved methods of delivering services and to review and evaluate existing family planning programs.

Program direction and management services. This activity provides for operating costs of the National Center for Family Planning Services.

REGIONAL MEDICAL PROGRAMS

Total program costs, funded	76,701	96,581	96,502
Change in selected resources	822
Total obligations	77,523	96,581	96,502

The goal of the regional medical programs service is to assist the Nation's health sector to provide the best possible care for patients with heart disease, cancer, stroke, and kidney diseases; to conduct education programs directed toward expanding public awareness of the adverse relationship between smoking and health; to identify the nutritional status of the Nation's population, and to develop methods and activities aimed at improving their health through better nutrition.

Regional medical programs. Grants. The regional medical programs promote and sustain, through grants, the developmental of regional cooperative arrangements among the Nation's health professions and institutions for: Regionalization of health resources and services; and enhancement of the capabilities of providers of care at the community level, and specifically to improve personal health care for persons threatened by heart disease, cancer, stroke, and related diseases. These activities are aimed at improving the quality of health care and strengthening the health care system generally throughout the Nation.

Medical personnel will participate in postgraduate and certificate training programs funded through regional medical program grants. Patients will benefit either from improved medical care or expanded health services derived from regional medical program projects. Medical schools, hospitals, community health organizations, and other health related institutions will be involved in planning and operational activities supported by regional medical programs.

Direct operations. Funds supported review processing and awarding of grants; provide health data required by the central regional medical program service staff and local regional medical programs in the implementation of their activities; and maintain appropriate relationships with the government and private agencies concerned with improving the organization and delivery of health services.

Technical assistance and disease control. These funds will support activities aimed at: providing continuing education assistance to the wide range of health occupations involved in diagnosing and treating heart disease, cancer, and stroke; providing technical and professional assistance to regional medical programs in the development and implementation of their activities and to promote the application of new concepts, standards, and practices in the areas of heart disease, cancer, stroke, and related diseases; preventing and controlling chronic kidney disease through improvement of artificial kidney treatment and increasingly to use kidney dialysis methods as a step toward more permanent treatment by means of the cadaver transplantation procedure; identifying and assessing the prevalence, location, and causes of malnutrition and assisting local resources in immediate and long-range remedial action; reducing the number of cigarette smokers by stimulating and supporting National, State, and local activities to help those who wish to stop smoking and by encouraging youth not to take up the practice.

In 1970, this activity supported five additional programs—heart disease control, cancer control, diabetes and arthritis, neurological and sensory diseases, and respiratory diseases—which are being eliminated in 1971.

Program direction and management services. This activity provides for a central staff needed in planning, directing, and evaluating the broad scope of program activities that exist in the regional medical programs service; maintains effective communication and information links with the local regional medical programs and the general public; and provides management services such as personnel management, management policy, contract administration, and general administrative services.

This program provides facilities and services for the investigation, prevention, and suppression of communicable diseases, including tuberculosis and venereal diseases, by the direct development, advancement, and demonstration of knowledge and techniques, through research grants, and through the prevention of the introduction of communicable diseases from foreign countries.

Prevention and control. Grants. Research grants are awarded to organizations, institutions, and individuals for research concerned with epidemiology, prevention, laboratory diagnosis, and treatment of communicable diseases at the community level.

Direct operations. Communicable diseases. Scientific and technical skills in the fields of epidemiological medicine and microbiology are provided to State and local health departments through investigations, consultations, and demonstrations. Important disease investigation and control programs include hepatitis, aseptic meningitis, poliomyelitis, rubella, viral encephalitis, the enteric diseases, staphylococcal and other institutionally acquired infections, the acute fungal diseases, diseases of animals transmissible to man, and the vector borne diseases. Professional competence in the investigation of epidemic outbreaks is afforded to the States through the staff of the Epidemic Intelligence Service which is constantly alert to the epidemic situation in the country. These Service officers provide a wide range of service, including epidemic aid, epidemiological field investigations, consultations in communicable disease control, surveillance of infectious diseases, and collaborative field and laboratory research.

Tuberculosis. Studies are conducted in epidemiology, prevention, detection, diagnosis, and therapy of tuberculosis. This research is conducted in cooperation with State and local health departments, tuberculosis hospitals, private investigators, and others. The results of the applied research are made available to the States and integrated into tuberculosis control programs by means of demonstrations, consultative services, operational studies, and training activities.

Venereal diseases. Research and evaluation activities are directed toward maintenance of uniformly satisfactory nationwide serologic services; development and introduction of new syphilis diagnostic tests; development of an immunizing agent for syphilis; improvement of diagnostic techniques for gonorrhea; evaluation of more effective methods of therapy; and the improvement of control procedures. Scientific and general information about venereal disease for both professional and lay groups is disseminated through State agencies.

Foreign quarantine. Certain visa applicants are examined in order to determine those who are excludable for physical or mental reasons. Other inspections—persons and importations—are made to prevent the introduction into the United States of quarantinable and other communicable diseases.

Laboratory improvement. A comprehensive national laboratory improvement program is administered through research for improving and standardizing laboratory methodology and through evaluation of techniques, materials, and reagents used in public health laboratories. States are provided experimental vaccines and special immune globulin is distributed to prevent and control laboratory infections. States are also provided consultation, training, and informational services in laboratory techniques. The program provides for upgrading the performance of the Nation's clinical laboratories and for the licensure and evaluation of clinical laboratories engaged in interstate commerce.

Program direction and management services. This activity includes top management and staff services for the National Center.

Federal funds are provided on a grant or loan basis to assist States, other public agencies, and nonprofit organizations in the construction or modernization of hospitals and other health facilities. Funds are also provided for payment of interest subsidies for guaranteed loans.

Construction grants. Federal funds are provided for the construction of rehabilitation facilities, diagnostic or treatment centers, public health centers, and related health facilities. The availability of diagnostic or treatment centers and rehabilitation facilities reduces the need to construct expensive bed-care institutions.

Direct and guaranteed loans. A new program of loans for the construction and modernization of hospitals and other medical facilities is authorized. This method of financing takes into consideration the increasing ability of hospitals to generate revenue to repay loans. Direct loans would be made to public institutions; guaranteed loans to private nonprofit agencies. Both direct loans and the guaranteed loan fund would be allotted to the States annually on the basis of population, financial needs, and need for additional health facilities and modernization. Direct loans would be at a reduced interest rate but the maximum loan or combination of loan and grant could not exceed 90 percent of the cost of a project.

Interest subsidies. The interest on guaranteed loans by non-Federal lenders to nonprofit private agencies for modernization or construction of hosiptals, long-term care facilities, and diagnostic or treatment centers will be subsidized with Federal funds. This subsidy will reduce the cost of mortgage money to these agencies and limit the need for direct Federal grants for construction of certain health facilities.

District of Columbia medical facilities. Public Law 90–457 authorizes grants and loans to assist public and private nonprofit medical facilities in the District of Columbia to meet the cost of projects for the construction or modernization of public health centers, long-term care facilities, including extended care facilities, diagnostic or treatment centers, rehabilitation facilities, facilities for the mentally retarded, and community mental health centers.

Program direction and technical assistance. State agencies are provided technical assistance in determining additional facilities required, and developing programs to meet the indicated needs. State plans and their annual revisions are reviewed for conformance with planning criteria and guidelines. Assistance is provided to States and communities in the planning, programing, design, and functioning of hospital and other health facilities, and proposed projects are reviewed to determine eligibility and compliance with the law and regulations. Construction projects are inspected and payments are made as construction progresses. In addition, the program provides program management assistance, consultation, and architectural and engineering assistance to construction projects assisted under the Health Manpower Act, health facilities assisted under sections 202 and 214 of the Appalachian Redevelopment Administration, and rehabilitation facilities assisted under Section 12 of the Vocational Rehabilitation Act.

Hospitals and outpatient facilities are operated to furnish medical and dental care to legal beneficiaries of the Public Health Service. The major beneficiary groups are American seamen, Coastguardsmen and their dependents, Bureau of Employees' Compensation cases, and persons afflicted with leprosy. Among these, the largest single category is the American seamen who receive comprehensive medical care in service facilities for all conditions. Medical care is also provided to foreign seamen and beneficiaries of other Federal agencies on a reimbursable basis.

Operation of hospitals and clinics. Operating under this activity are general hospitals, and the National Leprosarium at Carville, La. In addition, outpatient clinics and contract physicians handle ambulatory patients at these clinics and physicians' offices, respectively.

In addition to the direct provision of medical services, the Public Health Service hospitals are actively participating in efforts to improve health services in the local community. Professionals and allied health personnel receive clinical training in these facilities. Under section 328 of the Partnership for Health Amendments, the Federal Health Programs Service is cooperating in the operation of a neighborhood health center, a metropolitan areawide student mental health program and a community family planning clinic. Current plans are to expand community health activities in 1971.

Medical care for special groups. Coast Guard. Medical services are provided for Coast Guard personnel at shore stations and on vessels and include care in Public Health Service and other Federal facilities and care in contract facilities in areas where there are no Federal facilities available.

Federal employees. This activity provides consultation to and surveys of Federal agencies upon request on the conduct of Federal employees occupational health programs. Federal employee health programs are operated for Federal agencies on a reimbursable basis, on request.

Payment to Hawaii. Grants are made to Hawaii to defray the cost of care and treatment of persons afflicted with leprosy.

Personnel detailed to other agencies. Medical, dental, and other professional personnel are detailed to other Federal agencies on a reimbursable basis.

Program direction and management services. Staff program advice, guidance, and direction, along with management services, are provided operational personnel and facilities with regard to the efficient and effective conduct of program activities.

It includes: the collection, compilation, analysis, and dissemination of statistics on births, deaths, fetal deaths, marriages and divorces, and other health data related to these basic vital events; continuing surveys and special health statistics studies on the amount, distribution, and effects of illness and disability in the United States and the services received for or because of such conditions; studies of health survey methods with a view toward their continued improvement; and technical advice and assistance on the application of statistical methods in the health and medical fields.

Program direction and management services. All of the program activities of the National Center for Health Statistics are centrally directed and managed. The Office of the Director establishes program priorities for the Center and provides centralized administrative management support. The Office of Program Planning and Evaluation reviews program plans and periodically evaluates overall effectiveness of program activities.

This program provides medical care and public health services for Indians and Alaska native people.

Patient care. This activity consists of the operation of general hospitals and their outpatient clinics and tuberculosis sanatoria and medical care under contract with non-Federal hospitals, clinics, private physicians, and dentists, as well as contractual arrangements with State and local health organizations.

In 1971 a new—replacement—medical center at Phoenix, Ariz., will be in full operation. In addition, a pilot inpatient mental health program will be implemented at the Gallup Medical Center, Gallup, N. Mex., and the dietetic program will be expanded to extend the patient education services.

Field health services. These include programs in sanitation, health education, nutrition, maternal and child health, school health, tuberculosis, and other communicable disease control, medical social services, public health nursing, oral health, family planning, and mental health. The services are provided through health centers, clinics, and other field health units operated directly by the Indian Health Service, as well as through contractual arrangements with State and local health organizations. A program initiated in 1969 to train Indians as community health representatives providing educational, sanitation, and referral services to the Indian population will be continued. In addition to expanding the mental health program, a program to train Indians as nutrition aides will be initiated in 1971.

Special assistance to the Menominee Indian people. A 4-year program to assist the Menominee Indian people of Menominee County, Wis., was authorized by Public Law 89–653. This program terminated in 1970. The assistance covered joint school district costs and public welfare benefits as well as health and sanitation services.

Medical stockpile. The goal of this activity is to provide essential medical material for civilian needs in time of disaster. Medical supplies and equipment have been assembled into emergency packaged disaster hospitals which are located throughout the United States in affiliation with community hospitals. In 1971 such packaged disaster hospitals will be pre-positioned throughout the Nation. Selective medical supplies have been placed in community hospitals to meet heavy disaster medical care workloads. The estimate for 1971 provides a program for the accountability and maintenance of the medical stockpile inventories.

Community preparedness. Programs are inaugurated and maintained to support the preparation of national emergency health and medical plans and the development of preparedness action projects to achieve a continuity of health services necessary to meet all conditions of a national emergency. The estimate for 1971 provides for a program to assist States and communities during disaster situations; continue the development of plans and operational capability for civilian health manpower as well as utilization and distribution of health resources; develop and initiate disaster management services; and continue the operation of training programs at the State and local level. In 1971 persons in all 50 States will be trained in programs supported by the emergency health appropriation.

Program direction and management services. Total program control is provided for the organization and planning of programs that will afford adequate medical care for individuals in medical emergencies. The estimate for 1971 provides for a continuing activity that furnishes program direction, coordination, and management services to carry out the total emergency health preparedness program. Working relationships are to be maintained with professional organizations and other Government agencies for the development of an effective disaster readiness program for the civilian population.

The National Institutes of Health is the primary arm of the U.S. Government in the support of biomedical research, education, and communications. Its mission is investigating basic life processes; advancing the capability for the diagnosis, treatment, and prevention of disease; and supporting the development of adequate health research, educational, and communications resources.

In 1971, the National Institutes of Health will initiate or expand its activities in several areas. In a major program expansion, the National Cancer Institute will increase research on viruses as the cause of cancer with the aim of developing a vaccine or other means for preventing virus-induced cancers. The National Heart and Lung Institute will initiate a national effort to predict and control the relationship between risk factors and the incidence of diseases of the heart and lungs. The National Institute of Child Health and Human Development will expand research on diseases and other factors affecting the health of infants and children and will increase efforts to develop safe and effective contraceptives. The National Institute of Dental Research will expand research efforts to understand the cause, and develop a means of preventing, dental caries. Research on the biological effects of environmental pollutants will be increased by the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences and on eye diseases and disorders by the National Eye Institute. Biomedical research on other diseases and disorders will be continued at about the 1970 level by the National Institute of Arthritis and Metabolic Diseases, the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, the National Institute of Neurological Diseases and Stroke, and the National Institute of General Medical Sciences.

The missions of the research institutes and divisions are carried out through the following funding mechanisms: Research grants are awarded to individual researchers in support of projects which have been reviewed by study groups composed of outstanding scientists, recommended for their high scientific merit and approved by disease-oriented national advisory councils. Fellowships are awarded to promising individuals preparing for a research career in the biomedical sciences. Training grants are awarded to academic or research institutions which have demonstrated the ability to design and conduct successful training programs in one or more of the biomedical sciences.

In addition to grants, the research institutes and divisions of NIH support biomedical research through direct operations which can be categorized as follows: Laboratory and clinical research is conducted in the Institutes' laboratory facilities and in a commonly shared clinical center facility. Collaborative research and development projects are conducted by NIH researchers in collaboration with other Federal and non-Federal institutions largely through contracts and thus are strongly oriented toward the solution of specific health problems in areas where the state of knowledge is sufficiently advanced to permit a more directed approach. Other activities under direct operations include biometry, epidemiology, and field studies, international research, and biologics standards, and will be discussed under their respective appropriations. Funds are also included for program direction, research support and service activities, and review and approval of grants.

In 1971, increased efforts will be made to expand the supply of trained health manpower by assisting the institutions responsible for health education to expand enrollments. The Bureau of Health Professions Education and Manpower Training provides a national focus for health manpower activities, and supports programs designed to enlarge and improve the pool of qualified health manpower through institutional support grants, student assistance awards, and research grants and direct operations which evaluate and support special studies related to health manpower requirements and utilization. The National Library of Medicine serves as a national resource for biomedical information and as a focus for national planning to improve communications in the health sciences. Construction grants are provided on an individual project basis to public and other nonprofit agencies or organizations to assist in the construction of new facilities and the expansion, rehabilitation, and modernization of existing facilities for teaching, for research in the sciences related to health, and for medical library facilities. Appropriations for buildings and facilities support construction, renovation, and maintenance of NIH laboratory clinical and administrative facilities while that for Office of the Director supports salaries and expenses for the staff of the Director's office, NIH.

The biomedical research and health manpower programs which will be initiated or expanded in 1971 will be supported largely through research grants, direct operations of the research institutes—principally collaborative Research and Development contracts—and the programs of the Bureau of Health Professions Education and Manpower Training.

Grants. Research. Research grants support fundamental, clinical, and applied research studies in such areas as dental caries, periodontal disease, oral-facial growth and development, and dental restorative materials. Support is furnished for studies designed to advance scientific frontiers and exploit emerging research opportunities including: investigation of the interplay of host, dietary, and microbiotic factors in dental caries; development of more effective therapeutic and preventive measures in periodontal disease; development of treatment procedures and determination of preventive measures for oral-facial anomalies; and work on the immediate problems of dental treatment through development of new and improved restorative materials and clinical methods. In addition, support is furnished for clinical research centers, dental research institutes, and general research support grants.

Fellowships. Funds for fellowships are used for support of clinical and basic research training. Applications under this program are for special fellowships, predoctoral and postdoctoral fellowships, and career development and career awards.

Training. Training funds are the principal means of meeting the need for dental research and academic personnel in the dental schools to teach clinical and basic sciences and to conduct research.

Direct operations. Laboratory and clinical research. Laboratory and clinical research studies conducted in Institute facilities are concerned with the causes, treatment, control, and prevention of such dental diseases and disorders as caries, periodontal disease, oral-facial anomalies and oral cancer. Three primary approaches are used: Basic research directed at the acquisition of new knowledge as a means of solving dental health problems; field studies and clinical trials of new therapeutic and prevention concepts coming out of basic research; and further studies on the definition and distribution of oral-facial diseases and disorders on an epidemiologic or geographic basis. Much of this research will make direct contributions to the recently initiated national caries program.

Collaborative research and development. The programs in this activity involve contracts with public and private research and development organizations. Primary objectives include the development of new and improved dental restorative materials and support of the national caries program.

Biometry, epidemiology, and field studies. These activities are concerned with the planning, conduct, and analysis of epidemiological and field investigations concerning such matters as prevalence of oral disease, and effectiveness of new or improved methods of diagnosis, control, and prevention. A number of the studies conducted will be integral parts of the national caries program.

Fellowships. Postdoctoral and special fellowships will be supported, as well as career awards and career development fellowships.

Training. Training grants will be supported.

Direct operations. Laboratory and clinical research. Laboratory and clinical research is conducted in five major program areas of child health and human development. Reproduction and population research—reproductive biology, endocrinology, and ecology. Perinatal biology and infant mortality—maternal-child interactions; maturation of motor and behavioral systems; nutrition and development. Growth and development—neurophysiology, neurochemistry, and nutrition. Adult development and aging—cellular biology, biochemistry, physiology, and psychology. Mental retardation—biochemistry, neurophysiology, and behavioral research.

Collaborative research and development. Supplements the Institute's five research programs primarily through the contract mechanism. The research conducted is usually Institute initiated and is directed toward gaps in existing research or to expand on current studies of either the intramural program or the research grant program. This activity provides one of the most effective ways of coordinating programs development in the five program areas. The main thrust of the Institute's population research program is accomplished through contract efforts within this activity. In addition to the contract activities, program liaison is maintained and advanced through support of interdisciplinary research conferences and symposia and through scientific information centers.

Biometry, epidemiology, and field studies. Through contracted research, this activity supports the Institute's scientific staff in planning and conducting studies dealing with the incidence, distribution, and control of health problems in certain populations. Efforts are also being made to develop more effective and reliable means for measuring health problems, to collect and analyze health data and to make statistical studies for use in initiating and evaluating scientific programs.

Training activities. This activity represents the National Institute of Child Health and Human Development's career development program designed to help overcome the shortages of professional manpower in pediatrics and obstetrics and the lack of the necessary cross-disciplinary training required in the basic research programs of the Institute.

Grants. Research. Grants will be supported. In addition, funds are provided for general research support grants and categorical clinical research center grants.

Fellowships. Fellowships will be supported.

Training. Graduate training grants will be supported. These grants are made to training institutions to establish and improve programs to prepare clinical investigators and laboratory scientists for research and academic careers in disorders of the eye and visual system.

Institutional support. The principal agents of this activity are grant programs directed toward enhancing the educational experience of students entering the health and allied health professions resulting ultimately in better health service to the Nation. Schools use these funds to support and enlarge faculty staffs, expand library holdings, modify existing and add new curriculums, modernize teaching laboratories, and purchase educational aids and equipment. A substantial increase is requested in 1971 for these activities, of which $5,000,000 is for the physician augmentation program initiated in 1970.

Improving the utilization of limited resources of health professionals requires appraisal of the various types of personnel needed and the identification of new categories of allied health professionals and technicians for more effective team practice. In 1971, allied health new methods grants will support projects to develop curriculums to produce personnel requiring new identified skills.

Student assistance. Student assistance is of two kinds: graduate and specialized, comprising traineeships and research fellowships; and undergraduate, comprising scholarships and student loans. Research fellowships support candidates at the predoctoral and postdoctoral levels for research training in special fields related to studies for improving nursing care. Traineeships support the graduate and specialized preparation of teachers needed to expand and improve curriculum offerings, and the advanced training needed by supervisors, administrators, and other specialists in nursing, public health, and the allied health professions. Allied health short-term training will be provided for the first time in 1971.

Nursing and health professions scholarships enable deserving students from low-income families to pursue their education. Students of veterinary medicine became eligible for scholarships for the first time in 1970. Schools make scholarship awards to students who, in the judgment of the school, have an exceptional financial need. The student loan programs for the health professions, including nurses, are also designed to help provide an adequate supply of health manpower and to assure that the needed supply of health professions and nursing manpower is drawn from the most capable individuals, but particularly to assure that students from low-income families can enroll for health professions training. The 1971 program, as did the program in 1970, concentrates on making these loans to students from lower income families.

Pursuant to authority contained in the appropriation language, under certain conditions sums may be obligated for student assistance programs in advance of their being appropriated in order to facilitate the enrollment of students in health profession and related schools. The timing of these obligations, which is reflected in the schedules, does not affect the actual training of the students which is by academic year. Increases in appropriations for allied health traineeships and for nurse scholarships are requested.

Manpower requirements and utilization. Grants. Research grants support studies in the areas of physician methods and techniques, continuing physician education, effective use of health manpower, nursing care, and methods to deliver nursing care to patients. Research training grants enable institutions to establish training programs in fields where there is unusual demand for researchers having skills in nursing specialties and in the field of educational research.

Direct operations. Funds are provided for programs to assess requirements, availability, and quality of health discipline education; provide professional guidance and leadership to meet the goals of nursing care by means of research, consultation, application of research findings and administration of grants; develop, administer, and support grant and operational methods to increase the supply and improve the education, utilization, and effectiveness of manpower in the health occupations; for servicing training and construction grants, student loans, scholarships, and operational programs for training of personnel. The budget for 1971 includes increases for services and technical assistance related to expanded grant programs; continuing education and other physician manpower programs; nurse recruitment and refresher training contracts; and initiation of a program to encourage returning veterans to enter the health field.

Program direction and management services. The Bureau of Health Professions Education and Manpower Training provides a national focus for health manpower activities. The Bureau guides and supports health manpower programs, designs proposals to meet needs for new or revised health manpower programs, coordinates research, and program reporting activities, and provides technical guidance and coordination to Bureau activities.

The National Library of Medicine serves as a national resource for biomedical information and as a focus for national planning to improve communications in the health sciences. Toward these ends the Library conducts programs to provide: interlibrary loan, reference, and bibliographic services to units of the national system of libraries and information centers; bibliographic and literature searches through the computer-based medical literature analysis and retrieval system and its decentralized satellites; specialized information services including development of a toxicology information exchange to meet national needs for information relating to the effects of chemical agents on man; audiovisual resources and services and the development of new media for medical and health-related education through the National Medical Audiovisual Center; systems engineering, design, and implementation of a national, multimedia biomedical communications network for the most timely and efficient delivery of biomedical information to health professionals; and administration of grant support programs authorized by the Medical Library Assistance Act for the improvement of communications in the health sciences.

Grants for support of medical libraries. This activity provides funds for six categories of grant support as follows: Training, special scientific projects, research, library resources, regional medical libraries, and publications support.

Direct operations. Lister Hill National Center for Biomedical Communications. The Center applies existing technology to the development of biomedical communications systems aimed at improving health education, medical research, and the delivery of health services. The Center also serves as the Department's focal point for coordination of health communications systems and network projects. In 1971, the Center will continue planning and development of a national biomedical communications network, including continued identification of existing resources available to the network, demonstration of remote access devices to link the physician in his office to a central information source, and experimentation in telephone dial-access to diagnostic and therapeutic procedure messages.

National Medical Audiovisual Center. The Center's activities in 1971 will emphasize the collection, cataloging, and loan distribution of quality medical films and audio and video tape to qualified users; and, educational and technical assistance services to support the needs of schools of the health professions and practicing physicians. There will be a concomitant deemphasis on audiovisual productions.

Library operations. This activity provides bibliographic, reference, and loan services through a national network of regional and local medical libraries with the National Library of Medicine serving as Mid-Atlantic Regional Library and as a national backup for the network; acquires and maintains an archival and reference collection of the world's biomedical literature; and, supports the development and operation of the medical literature analysis and retrieval system, a computer-based bibliographic information storage and retrieval system now undergoing conversion to a second-generation system with expanded capacity and capabilities.

Toxicology information. The program was established in the National Library of Medicine in 1968 to develop and operate a computer-based information storage, processing, and retrieval system on the effects of chemical compounds on man and his environment. In 1971, development will continue with file building for selected pesticides and poisons, programing software development for the computer storage and retrieval system, continued identification and updating of the list of useful information sources which will be published in the "Directory of Information Sources in the United States: Toxicology," and development of a retrospective drug interaction reference file.

Review and approval of grants. This activity supports the scientific and administrative staff responsible for grant review, negotiation, processing, and award. This staff also provides program planning, contract development, review, and evaluation of projects abroad funded by the appropriation Scientific activities overseas.

Program direction. Funds in this activity support the staffs of the Immediate Office of the Director, Office of Administrative Management, and the Office of Public Information and Publications Management and reimbursement to the National Institutes of Health management fund for centralized administrative and plant maintenance support services.

The National Institutes of Health service and supply fund provides a single means for consolidated financing and accounting of business-type operations involving the sale of services and commodities to customers.

The following activities are carried out under the fund:

Administrative services. These services include the sale of commodities, printing and reproduction services, and other services. The NIH maintains a supply of scientific and general-use materials and supplies, alteration and construction material, linens, and special equipment. The printing and reproduction section provides printing, distribution, and related services.

Data processing services. This central facility is expected to provide data systems design and consultation, key punching, computer programing, and computer processing services to institute/divisions of NIH.

Instrumentation. The biomedical instrumentation and engineering branch maintains, repairs, and fabricates scientific laboratory apparatus and equipment for use in the research laboratories at NIH. There is also a specialized inventory of materials used in the development of the scientific equipment which is part of the services provided by the shops.

Research animals. The NIH animal facilities provide small and large research animals to the research laboratories. The facilities include breeding, holding, and conditioning facilities for mice, rats, guinea pigs, rabbits, hamsters, dogs, cats, primates, and ungulate animals.

Medical assistance. Grants for medical assistance under title XIX of the Social Security Act—medicaid—and for medical assistance provided under other titles of the act are made to States having plans approved by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. After January 1, 1970, Federal financial participation in payments to medical vendors will be available only under medicaid. Federal medicaid payments vary from 50 percent to 83 percent according to the per capita income of the State. Eligible recipients must include all persons receiving or eligible to receive money payments under the Social Security Act. States also may elect to cover certain medically needy persons eligible for help only with their medical bills. Medicaid complements the Federal medicare program by paying the deductible and coinsurance for the needy aged, paying their premiums for medicare's supplementary medical insurance program, and by paying for services not covered by Medicare; for example, long-term nursing home care.

The Federal share is expected to amount to about 52 percent of the total Federal, State, and local expenditure in 1971, slightly more than in 1970. More favorable matching provisions under title XIX compared to the provisions of the money payment titles and increasing expenditures for States with relatively higher medical assistance percentages are responsible for the increasing Federal share.

The major factors accounting for the increase from 1970 to 1971 for Federal payments are the continued rise in medical prices, an increase in the number of eligible recipients, and continued increase in utilization under State programs.

As more States come into the program, a larger number of persons becomes eligible for medical assistance. As of July 1, 1969, 44 States or jurisdictions were operating under medicaid. It is anticipated that all of the remaining States will begin operation during the year.

Medical assistance payments are for care in hospitals and nursing homes, physicians' fees, and drugs.

The Medical Services Administration within the Social and Rehabilitation Service of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has responsibility for providing program direction for medicaid.

For those not eligible for maintenance assistance		—18,290
State and local administration		1,307
Total		—22,183

The above is part of Grants to States for Public Assistance which is proposed for separate transmittal, existing legislation.

In November 1969, State public assistance agencies forecast the Federal share of public assistance programs in 1970 as $7,554,984,000, or $146,753,000 over the amount appropriated. Of the latter amount, medical assistance accounts for $22,183,000. The overall increase is due to repeal of the aid to families with dependent children "freeze" requirement and increased costs for social services and administration, but offset in part by reduced estimates of 1970 costs for the adult categories and for medical assistance vendor payments.

Health insurance program. The hospital insurance program affords protection to persons age 65 and over against the costs of inpatient hospital services, posthospital home health services and posthospital extended care services. Bills for services rendered under the hospital insurance program are generally submitted by hospitals, extended care facilities, home health agencies and, in some instances, by individuals who have received emergency care in nonparticipating hospitals. The growth in beneficiaries who will be covered by the program as the population age 65 and over increases and the rise in the utilization rates of available services cause an increase in the number of bills in both 1970 and 1971.

Supplementary medical insurance program. Almost all persons age 65 and over are eligible to enroll in the supplementary medical insurance program which covers the cost of physician services and other medical costs within certain deductible and coinsurance requirements. Enrollees in the program pay a monthly premium and the aggregate of these premiums is matched by the Federal Government by appropriations from Federal funds.

The volume of claims will rise in 1970 and 1971 as a result of the growth in the age-65-and-over population and the projected increase in utilization of medical services.

The administrative costs budgeted under this activity cover the bill and claim payment functions performed by the intermediaries and carriers; services performed by the State agencies in certifying and consulting with providers of services; all work performed by the Social Security Administration in directing the program, providing services to beneficiaries, maintaining records by individual beneficiary of utilization of hospital and medical services and processing claims to establish entitlement to hospital insurance for persons not insured for cash benefits under either the social security or railroad retirement program.

For persons on the social security and railroad retirement rolls, the costs of services covered by the hospital insurance program and administrative costs are financed by contributions from workers, employers, and self-employed individuals based on earnings. Costs for those not insured under the social security or railroad retirement program are met from general revenues of the Treasury.

Benefit payments. The hospital insurance program provides protection to persons age 65 and over against the costs of inpatient hospital services, posthospital home health services, and posthospital extended care services. The growth in benefit payments in 1970 and 1971 results from increases in covered population and in utilization of services and unit cost of services.

Construction. The costs of site acquisition, design, construction, alterations, and equipment of office facilities for the Social Security Administration are financed by this and the other trust funds.

Administration. The administrative expenses of the Social Security Administration as reflected in its salaries and expenses appropriation and those incurred for social security programs by the Treasury Department and other Department of Health, Education, and Welfare components are financed in part by each trust fund.

Incentive reimbursement experimentation. The 1967 social security amendments provide authorization to conduct experiments for reimbursement of providers of services on a basis other than the "reasonable cost" or "reasonable charges" provisions generally applicable under the medicare program in order to achieve incentives for economy while maintaining or improving quality in the provision of health services. Costs of administering and evaluating the experiments are distributed currently on an estimated basis between the hospital insurance and supplementary medical insurance trust funds.

Almost all persons age 65 and over are eligible to enroll in the voluntary supplementary medical insurance program provided by the Social Security Act, and about 95 percent of those eligible have chosen to do so. The costs of services covered by the program and administrative expenses are financed by premium payments from enrollees together with matching contributions from the general revenues of the Treasury.

Benefit payments. Participants in the program are covered for the costs of physicians' services, home health services not covered under the hospital insurance program, outpatient services, and certain other medical costs with specified deductible and coinsurance amounts.

Construction. The costs of site acquisition, design, construction, alteration, and equipment of office facilities for the Social Security Administration are financed by this and the other trust funds.

Administration. Medical, hospital, and domiciliary administration. This covers the development, implementation, and administration of policies, plans, and broad objectives, and provides executive direction for all agency medical programs.

Postgraduate and inservice training. This provides for tuition and registration payments, lecturer fees, travel expenses, and training materials incidental to continuing education programs for professional medical and administrative staff. This also serves as a media for disseminating information on medical advances resulting from research efforts.

Exchange of medical information. This provides for entering into agreements with medical schools, hospitals, research centers and individual institutions, and members of the medical-scientific community under which physicians at hospitals not affiliated with medical schools will maintain closer contact with such schools and other primary sources of medical information.

These funds provide for the construction of new hospital and domiciliary facilities, replacement and relocation of existing hospitals and domiciliaries, acquisition of sites, modernization and other improvements, alterations and additions for medical research facilities, nursing home beds, regional offices, supply depots, and data processing centers, including construction planning, administration, and related staff activities. This estimate is for the eleventh increment for financing a program to modernize the hospital system. While this program will be primarily for improvements to the older—pre-World War II—hospitals, it will also provide for replacement of hospitals, for air conditioning where indicated, and for the correction of deficiencies in post-World War II hospitals as necessary to bring them up to modern medical standards.

Pursuant to Public Law 90-146, the Commission is conducting a comprehensive study and investigation of the scope and adequacy of measures currently employed to protect consumers against unreasonable risk of injuries which may be caused by hazardous household products. Such study and investigation includes consideration of the following:

The identity of categories of household products which may present an unreasonable hazard to the health and safety of the consuming public.

The extent to which self-regulation by industry affords such protection.

The protection against such hazardous products afforded at common law in the States, including the relationship of product warranty to such protection.

A review of Federal, State, and local laws relating to the protection of consumers against categories of such hazardous products, including scope of coverage, effectiveness of sanctions, adequacy of investigatory powers, uniformity of application, and quality of enforcement of those laws.

NEEDHAM TOWNSPEOPLE CONFRONT DRUG PROBLEM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Massachusetts (Mrs. HECKLER), is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mrs. HECKLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, when Art Linkletter's daughter died from the effects of drug abuse, the Nation shuddered and grieved at this bereavement, which was a dramatic illustration of the proliferation of the drug problem in America. When the tragic death of Robert Marshalsea occurred in Needham, Mass., more recently, drug addiction became an even more personal problem for me. Ready availability of narcotics is now a fact in nearly every city and town across the country, but this is no consolation to the family who experiences the grief that drug addiction brings or to the community faced with the complexities of eradicating drug traffic.

There is no more stirring narrative than that relating to the death of this fine young Needham boy, who was so popular among his friends and classmates, and all who know his story share in his family's sense of loss. Thirty-seven other persons in Massachusetts have recently traveled the stormy road of drug abuse to a similarly tragic conclusion—further credible evidence of the widespread availability and use of drugs in Massachusetts and the attendant miseries.

The drug crisis is many-faceted, and all the resources of the community, State, and Federal Government must be mustered to attack every aspect of the problem. Control of drugs must be developed through legislation on Federal and State levels. The pressing need for effective and available rehabilitation must be met. Those who have fallen prey to the ravages of narcotics addiction cannot cure themselves without continuous and sympathetic professional help and public understanding. The challenge can never be met by speeches of public officials or by broken hearts of grief-stricken families. The joint efforts of every community organization and age-group must be combined to wage an active campaign against this devastating contagion plaging American society today.

The swift and responsive action of the town of Needham in rising to confront the problem culminating in the local death gives great hope for the future. Chairman Richard Salamone and the board of selectmen, the townspeople of Needham, and the young people themselves displayed great courage as well as their spirit of cooperation in convening town meeting and boldly speaking out. The example here might well be followed by other communities besieged with narcotic traffic. Great resolve and determination will be required to face the dimensions of this problem in an effective way—for those who are tempted by narcotics pushers, to realize their potential vulnerability; for those who are taking drugs, to admit their weakness and come to grips with rehabilitation; for teenagers, to speak out against the drug invasion in the schools; for the community, to develop responsive and properly staffed rehabilitation clinics. The illness of drug abuse has a mysterious, elusive quality, and the cure will not be easily found.

On the Federal level, I shall certainly do everything within my power to provide the latest information, to support effective legislation, and to augment the efforts of local officials in waging war on drug traffic, drug abuse, and in developing practical methods of rehabilitation which will reach all who are in need. We must assure that this young Needham life, extinguished in such a tragic manner, was a life not lost in vain.

The future of American society lies in the healthy development and education of youth's leadership potential, and the drug crisis must be the focus of every citizen's concern until the threat is overcome. The youth of America have all the talent necessary to meet the problems of today and tomorrow with constructive solutions. Through their unsurpassed commitment and involvement in social concerns, I am confident that the current crisis of the drug problem will be conquered—and that the quality of life throughout America will be significantly improved through the contribution of work and dedication of our younger generation reaching maturity at this difficult and bewildering time.

TAKE PRIDE IN AMERICA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. MILLER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, today we should take note of America's great accomplishments and in so doing renew our faith and confidence in ourselves as individuals and as a nation. The United States is the leading producer of steel ingots and castings in the world. In 1967 the United States produced 115,406,000 metric tons of steel ingots and castings. The Soviet Union was second, producing 102,200,000.

VETERANS' BENEFITS MUST BE INCREASED

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PRICE), is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. PRICE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, as this is Easter week, I can think of no more appropriate a time than this for Congress to turn its attention to a group of Americans who have made great sacrifices for our country. I refer to our veterans of military service.

American veterans are living monuments to this Nation's dedication to the cause of freedom and its willingness to stand firm and fight, if need be, against communism and tyranny wherever and whenever it rears its ugly head.

Our veterans are more than living monuments, however, they are, above all human beings who have rendered a great patriotic service to the Nation. They deserve our undying gratitude and our dedicated assistance.

I think it is most unfortunate, indeed it is tragic, that benefits provided veterans have not kept pace with the rising costs of living. Inflation, like a thief in the night, has robbed veterans of their justly deserved benefits, just as it has robbed all those who depend to one extent or another on fixed sources of income.

In my judgment, Congress has the responsibility to rectify this sad state of affairs. Congress must help our honored veterans stay abreast of rising living costs.

In an effort to facilitate congressional action, I am today introducing two bills which I hope will provide a foundation on which improvements in veterans benefits can soon be adopted. One bill, would increase the rates of compensation for disabled veterans, a group particularly deserving of society's assistance. This bill, in recognition of the great human sacrifices our soldiers have made in past wars and are continuing to make in the war in Vietnam, would limit the rate increases to those veterans with service-connected disabilities.

My second proposal would increase the rates of compensation and increase the income limitations on pension payments and parents dependence and indemnity compensation. This bill is aimed at providing veterans and widows who receive non-service-connected pensions with a substantial increase in payments. The same would apply to dependent parents receiving dependency and indemnity compensation.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, these two bills, taken together, provide much needed benefit increases. These increases, which amount to approximately 10 percent will truly bring a greater measure of economic parity to veterans and their families. To deny them this full measure would be unthinkable. To refuse them their hard-earned due would be criminal.

Throughout the remainder of this Easter week, I beseech my colleagues to also turn their thoughts and pledge their help to our military veterans. They need our assistance because they sacrificed for us. Dare we let their sacrifices go unrewarded?

THE DEVELOPING CRISIS IN INTERNATIONAL TRADE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND), is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, a veritable tide of imported products is streaming into the United States, jeopardizing scores of American industries, and the jobs of millions of American workers. Foreign industries are taking a larger and larger share of the American market in everything from steel to mink-skins. Without protective devices—higher tariffs, for example, or something roughly akin to quota systems—foreign manufacturers find it startlingly easy to underprice their American competitors in the U.S. marketplace.

The cheap labor supply amply available in most European and Asian countries gives their industries an enormous economic advantage over ours. How, for example, can a U.S. shoe firm paying its workers $5 an hour compete with an Asian firm paying what is equivalent to 20 cents an hour? The answer, of course, is that it cannot.

Foreign inroads into the American marketplace pose a major threat to an entire spectrum of U.S. industries—the shoe industry, the apparel industry, the ceramic industry, the textile industry, and many others.

Today, however, I would like to speak specifically about the domestic electronics industry. Workers in this industry—hundreds of thousands of workers living everywhere from California to Maine—may eventually lose their jobs unless the Congress and the administration act to shield them against unfair foreign competition. They face a dual threat: An alarming rise in the importation of electronic products from foreign manufacturers, and an equally alarming rise in the number of American electronic firms setting up operations in foreign countries. A few statistics make plain the extent of this latter threat. The accompanying tables—table 1 and table 2—show, first, the U.S. electronic firms now operating in Mexico near the American border and, second, the U.S. firms now operating in Taiwan. This grim trend toward relocation abroad increases virtually week by week, taking more and more jobs away from American workers.

Local 1500 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers—the union local representing workers at the Sickles Division of the General Instrument Co. in Chicopee, Mass.—has asked the U.S. Tariff Commission to examine the plight of American electronics workers and to recommend means of redress.

Four members of Local 1500 were in Washington last week conferring with my colleague Congressman CONTE and me on their petition to the Tariff Commission and taking part in an AFL–CIO Industrial Union Department meeting on "The Developing Crisis in International Trade."

They are:

Mrs. Ethel Gregoire, president of Local 1500.

Mrs. Esther Bubilo, recording secretary.

Mrs. Muriel Otto.

Mr. George Breault.

The IBEW's New England representative, Robert Dillon, accompanied them to Washington.

The following white paper, prepared by the AFL–CIO and entitled the "Developing Crisis in Electronics and Companion Industries," makes explicit the concern of Local 1500 and hundreds of other IBEW locals throughout the United States.

The Developing Crisis in Electronics and Companion Industries

I. Current Reasons for Concern

While the Electronics industries are considered to be among the Nation's leading growth industries, current developments in consumer electronics, components, business and computing machines, and companion product lines, should give every American—not merely those whose jobs are directly threatened—genuine cause for concern. For, what is happening is this:

Key growth segments of electronics and companion industries (their know-how, production and jobs) have been, and are being, exported abroad. Moreover, the exodus is rapidly escalating.

The dangerously rising volume of imports—increasingly, in foreign-made American brands and in imports by domestic parent firms from foreign-based plants—tends to accelerate the process of terminating U.S. operations and transferring domestic production and product lines to facilities outside U.S. borders.

The production and jobs transferred abroad are, to a large extent, of the types urgently needed here. They are needed if we are to find work for members of minority groups as well as others among the unemployed poor whom we are now trying to reach through antipoverty, manpower training, and similar programs, at a vast expense of taxpayer dollars.

While the electronics industries, and major electronics-electrical firms, are and have been heavily subsidized by the Federal government, they may possibly grow even more dependent on government, especially the Defense Department, for support. Currently, annual sales to DOD and, in far smaller amounts, to other government agencies, aggregate $13 billion. This represents more than half the industries' $25 billion in annual sales.

II. Historical Summary and Short Statistical Rundown

Electronics grew from a $1 billion to a $25 billion industry in 20 years. Over these 20 years, the Federal government has not only been the industry's largest customer, taking annually a major slice of its dollar output; it has also been the underwriter and sponsor of its remarkable technological progress.

Giant corporations dependent on Defense contracts for a substantial portion of sales include General Electric, Westinghouse, R.C.A., I.T.T., Sperry-Rand, Litton Industries, and dozens of others. In fiscal 1969, G.E.'s Defense contracts totaled more than $1.6 billion. Raytheon's amounted to $547 million; Sperry-Rand's, to $468 million; Westinghouse's, to $430 million; Litton Industries', to $377 million; and R.C.A.'s, to $300 million. Without profitable Defense contracts, Sperry-Rand could hardly have weathered large, sustained computer and business machines losses. Sperry's most profitable product line today is computers, but it was its Defense business that kept it solvent.

The technological lead of American electronics firms was nurtured and underwritten by billions of dollars in government R&D money. As the OECD Directorate For Scientific Affairs points out, "semiconductors, numerical control, electronic computers . . . as well as a host of other less significant innovations, owe their development to Federal support." Huge Federal outlays for research, development, test and evaluation, made possible revolutionary developments in miniaturization, microwave, solid state, integrated circuitry, laser technology, etc.; thereby helping to give domestic firms a commanding technological edge over foreign competitors. Many of the profitable patents these firms hold—and on which they are paid royalties by foreign and domestic firms—resulted from government sponsored R&D programs. As indicated earlier, production and product lines financed by government R&D funds have been transferred to U.S.-owned overseas plants.

How much taxpayer money was poured into R&D? According to National Science Foundation figures, from 1957 to 1965, leading firms in the electronics (and communications) industries spent $23 billion for research and development—22–24 percent of total domestic R&D expenditures. Of this amount, two-thirds was directly provided by the Federal government.

Overseas capital investment by the American electrical-electronics industry continues undiminished, despite the imposition of direct investment controls. Expenditures for equipment and plants outside U.S. borders by electrical-electronics concerns were estimated at $625 million for the years 1967–68. About $2.5 billion was directly invested in new equipment and plants abroad during the 1958–68 decade. This sum does not include profits earned, accumulated and reinvested abroad. According to available but incomplete statistics, at least two dozen new American-owned plants were established on the Mexican border within the past year. The trade press and official records show similar escalating shifts of production, products, and jobs to Taiwan, Hong Kong, South Korea, Singapore and other areas in the Far East.

The process feeds on itself. The transfer of production, product lines, and jobs abroad by one or two American firms is a signal for others to follow. That is is one reason why new and expanded U.S.-owned plants are springing up on the Mexican border and in the Far East, as well as in Europe. The exodus is encouraged and abetted by the U.S. Department of Commerce, which frequently acts as promoter and agent for U.S. firms. Commerce Department employees stationed abroad assist U.S. companies in finding suitable plant locations. Occasionally, they may also arrange financing, and provide other advertised services. As inducements, host countries (Taiwan, Mexico, South Korea, Singapore, Hong Kong, etc.) offer tax and rent concessions plus other attratcive advantages—in addition, of course, to wage costs that range from less than 15 cents to 30 or 35 cents an hour.

The General Instrument Company is a case in point. It is now the largest employer in Taiwan, with 12,000 workers in its semiconductor, TV tuner, recorder and IFT plant—up from last year's 7,200, and from 500 in 1962, the year the plant opened. Hourly wages including fringes, average 15–20 cents. In the last two years, G.I. closed three of its components plants in New England—one in Rhode Island two in Massachusetts. All told, close to 2,000 workers were permanently displaced. Production of affected product lines was transferred to the company's expanded Taiwan facility. Other product lines and jobs may soon follow.

A second case in point is Ford-Philco, whose work force in Philadelphia was recently reduced by 1300, with additional layoff foreseen. Philco-Taiwan, with current employment of over a thousand, now makes radios, phonographs and components for hi-fi and Color TV assemblies previously manufactured in the U.S. Philco has also been importing sets from Japan under its own brand name, further reducing domestic employment.

Electronics is rapidly developing into one of Taiwan's major industries and especially into its major export industry. In 1968, for example, it exported $60 million worth of electronic products, up from $36 million in 1966. But by 1972, Taiwan's export of TV sets alone—almost entirely to this country—should reach $250 million. Total 1972 electronic exports are estimated at $500 million. Currently, exports to the U.S. in major electronic categories are up 40–80 percent from year ago levels. About 650,000 B & W TV sets were exported to the U.S. in 1969—80 percent more than the year before.

Restrictions imposed on foreign firms make it impossible for them to sell radios, TV sets or other products on the domestic Taiwanese market. American firms, however, are not seriously interested in producing for the Taiwanese market. They came to Taiwan primarily for one reason: to manufacture products at Taiwanese wage costs for exports to the U.S. Some of the American firms with factories in Taiwan are: I.B.M., G.E., T.R.W., R.C.A., Admiral, Philco (two plants), Cornell Dubilier, Raytheon, Motorola, Singer, General Instrument, Ampex, C.T.S., etc.

The Mexican border program, devised to attract U.S. firms south of the border through substantial wage differentials plus other advantages, similarly imposes restrictions that make it impossible for such firms to sell Mexican-made products on the Mexican market. Directly below our border, we have a classic illustration of what such programs are about. Parts and components—machinery, too—are imported into Mexico duty free, machined and assembled in Mexican plants, and then shipped back to the U.S. for final, finish-up assembly in completed units. This is known as the Twin Plants concept.

The U.S. plants, however, are quite small and, quite frequently, only for show. Units are fully assembled into finished products in Mexican factories by Mexican workers earning 30–35 cents an hour. (Nearly 208,000 B & W TV sets were exported to the U.S. in 1969, up 420 percent from 1968). But the tariff on goods shipped back to the U.S. is only on the "value added" by low wage Mexican workers. Thus, a TV set assembled in Mexico from U.S.-made component parts pays only a fraction of the tariff levied on TV sets wholly made abroad from parts and components supplied by foreign manufacturers.

The "value added" tariff, applied as it is now, in conjunction with wage differentials merely encourages "runaway" companies to relocate. The same "value added" tarriff is applied, incidentally, to imports from U.S.-owned plants in Taiwan, Hong Kong, South Korea and elsewhere, whenever almost wholly assembled products are made from parts shipped to the foreign facility from a U.S. plant. The applicable section of the law—Section 807—needs to be drastically changed.

Sales of foreign manufacturing affiliates of U.S. firms were $4 billion in 1965, compared with $1.9 billion in 1959. Though reliable current sales data is unavailable through government or private sources, we have reason to believe sales have increased at a much higher ratio than in previous years. In 1968, for example, G.E.'s foreign affiliates had net sales of $800 million, while I.T.T. and Singer's foreign affiliates had estimated sales aggregating more than $1 billion between them. What should be remembered is that sales of such foreign manufacturing affiliates are, to an increasing extent, imports into the U.S.

Finally, while there are no accurate statistics on the number of electronic, electrical, household, office and business machine facilities owned and operated abroad by multinational American corporations (a large percentage of whom are conglomerates), the number may be figured in thousands. As previously indicated, the number rises each year. All major corporations, as well as a large and growing number of medium-sized and smaller companies, now own and operate plants abroad, using government-subsidized technology and production know-how to manufacture products, formerly made here, for import into the U.S. (or to manufacture products for sale to third countries—frequently, depriving one of the company's U.S. affiliates of its markets).

III. RISING IMPORTS, TRANSFERS OF PRODUCTION AND DOMESTIC PLANT CLOSINGS

In 1967, the value of TV sets imported by the U.S. amounted to $125.5 million. TV imports in 1969 are estimated at about $300 million, up 46 percent from 1968 and 140 percent from 1967. According to preliminary figures, Japan alone exported to the U.S. 880,000 Color and over 2,200,000 B & W TV sets, supplying more than 15 percent of the U.S. Color and more than 40 percent of the U.S. B & W TV market.

In 1967, the value of radio receiving sets, radio-phonograph combinations and parts, and radio apparatus, imported into the U.S., totaled $243 million. Imports for the first 11 months of 1969 are $374.5 million, and the full year estimate ranges between $410–$420 million. An estimated 85–90 percent of all radios sold in the U.S. are imports. From January to October, 1969, the U.S. imported 17 million transistor radios from Japan; 13 million from Hong Kong; close to 4 million from Taiwan; and close to 900,000 from South Korea.

In 1967, the value of phonographs, tape recorders and other sound recorders and reproducers imported into the U.S., was $153.4 million. In the first 11 months of 1969, the figure was $303.8 million. For the full year, it could reach $335 million, up 45 percent from 1968. Less than 10 percent of the tape recorders, cassettes, or similar equipment sold in the U.S. market are made in U.S. plants.

Thus, within two years, from 1967 to 1969, the dollar value of imports of TV sets, radios, phonographs, radio-phonographs, tape recorders and related consumer products has doubled. This doubling follows a previous quadrupling of the value of imports in the years 1962–67. Our 1969 balance of trade deficit on these consumer electronic products should approach one billion dollars.

Last year, Westinghouse closed its TV manufacturing plants in Edison, New Jersey, laying off 3,000 workers. Like several other firms, Westinghouse now imports and sells—under its own brand—Color and B & W TV sets made for it by Japanese firms. Formerly a manufacturer, it is now a distributor.[1] Several other U.S. manufacturers import and sell under their own brand Color and B & W TV sets, radios and other consumer equipment. TMA in Illinois cut back its production lines over 50 percent when it began importing radios and stereos from Japan.

As previously indicated, a sizable number of manufacturers have transferred production to foreign-based plants. Sylvania, for example, now makes TV sets in Hong Kong; Warwick Electronics, which supplies Sears, has drastically reduced production, and laid off hundreds of workers in its Arkansas plant, transferring TV output to a Mexican facility. Admiral and Motorola have established consumer electronics plants in Taiwan. In one of its recent ads, G.E. announced it was the only remaining domestic manufacturer of radios. Implicit in the ad was a warning it might discontinue all production of radios in the U.S.

The domestic household sewing machine industry is now confined to part of one plant (Singer) in Elizabethport, New Jersey, which employs some 2,000 workers (previous employment high was over 10,000). It is the only remaining household sewing machine plant in the U.S. Yet for every three Singer machines sold here, two were made in the company's foreign plants.

During the past decade, the acquisition-conscious Singer Company acquired a number of major firms in the electronics and office machines industries, among them Friden, a manufacturer of office calculators now known as the Friden Division. Two years ago, Friden signed an agreement with Hitachi, whereby Hitachi would manufacture—under the Friden label and to Friden's specifications—its electronic desk calculators. Friden now distributes in the U.S. and abroad Friden calculators made by Hitachi in Japan.

Burroughs and others have similar agreements. Formerly manufacturers, they have become distributors of the products they once made. The domestic electronic desk calculator business is now dominated by Japanese firms. Currently, 60 percent of this growing market is controlled by Japanese firms. Within the next two or three years, Japanese manufacturers are expected to supply almost the entire market—directly, as well as through Friden, Burroughs and other domestic labels.

Several months ago, the press reported that Litton Industries—a major conglomerate whose various enterprises, such as shipbuilding and electronics, are heavily subsidized by DOD contracts—was shutting down domestic Royal typewriter plants. We learned earlier the Justice Department was investigating the company's acquisition of two German typewriter firms, Triomph and Adlerwerke, for possible Antitrust Act violations. Litton moved into the typewriter business in 1965 when it acquired Royal-McBee. A year or two later, it bought up the British company, Imperial Typewriters, Ltd. The Royal DeLuxe 660, one of the more popular and attractive Royal models, became the Imperial 660. Now Litton has announced Royal Typewriter models will be made in Japan to Royal specifications.

Sperry-Rand, kept alive through Defense contracts and R&D money, decided to close out domestic production of typewriter models a number of years ago. Sperry shifted operations to its European plants. These plants were subsequently closed. Now, Remington typewriters are made for Sperry under the Remington label by the Japanese firm, Brothers.

There is a campaign, promoted and supported by American industry, to urge the Japanese government to remove restrictions imposed on freedom of foreign investment, and on ownership and control of manufacturing facilities and enterprises in that country. It should be noted that some firms already have substantial, though not controling, investments in Japanese concerns.[2] A major example is G.E., which owns 10 percent of the outstanding stock of Tokyo Shibaura Electric (G.E. also owns 12 percent of the outstanding stock of the German electrical giant, A.E.G.).

We do not believe any agreements reached between the U.S. and Japan permitting American ownership and control of manufacturing facilities in Japan in the electrical and electronic industries would be in the best interests either of American workers or the American people at this time. We feel it would further encourage export of production and jobs from the U.S.

IV. EMPLOYMENT, COMPARATIVE WAGE COSTS AND MAN-HOUR PRODUCTIVITY

By and large, employment in the Electrical Equipment and Supplies industry (SIC 36) has held up fairly well. Expanded Defense efforts and national economic growth were important contributing factors in the growth of this diverse industry group. Unemployment in the industry, however, may soon be on the rise, threatening to occur at a time when the labor force is rapidly increasing (it will grow 16 percent, to a total of 94 million by 1975) and at a time when the Administration is engaged in a massive drive to find hundreds of thousands of jobs for Negroes, Mexican-Americans and others among the poor for whom gainful employment is urgently needed. The government's various job creating and manpower training programs require several billions of dollars annually in federal expenditures. Yet the types of jobs exported are precisely the unskilled and semi-skilled jobs needed here if we are to win the war against poverty and provide gainful employment of our disadvantaged poor.

Moreover, at a time when total national and manufacturing employment was expanding, comparative figures for the months of October 1966, and October, 1969, show a decline of 24,500 factory production workers (17 percent) in the Radio and TV Receiving Equipment industry. In Electronic Components and Accessories, there was a decline of 20,100 factory workers. The combined production worker decline in the two related industries comes to 44,600. Since these are basically growth industries, there should normally have been an increase in the number of production workers employed.

[1] Emerson Radio Division of National Union Electric, another New Jersey TV manufacturer, has announced it is closing out production of TV and other consumer electronic equipment.

[2] American firms also have licensing agreements with Japanese and European counterparts, the latter paying royalties for the use of American patents.

In another major growth industry, Office and Computing Machines, there was a total employment increase of 30,000, yet factory employment was up only a mere 400 jobs. The annual growth in computer shipments has averaged 15 percent, and this rate of growth should continue at least until 1975. However, firms in this industry have been exporting component parts to overseas plants for assembly into completed machines, effectively cutting into our exports of such machines. These foreign plants may soon be producing their own parts.

The effect cutbacks in Defense and other government programs will have on factory employment in other electrical-electronic industries is difficult to predict, but it could be quite severe.

A careful analysis of our employment problems indicates the need to retain and to increase the number of jobs of the types now being exported. Such jobs are required for those among our citizens most in need of productive work.

Since high labor costs are invariably given as a major reason for rising imports as well as for the shift of domestic production to U.S.-owned overseas plants, let us analyze this argument for a moment. When we do analyze it, we find that multinational conglomerate corporations have achieved almost unlimited exportability of capital, technology, production lines and production techniques. They can move capital, production and jobs freely wherever they wish, taking easy and quick advantage of substandard wages, low rents, favorable interest rates, tax loopholes, and tariff concessions. And, it is obvious the American taxpayer and the American worker has subsidized this mobility.

High U.S. labor costs are used increasingly to dismiss the problem as well as to assess blame. There is no merit in such contentions. For, wages in these industries—not high in themselves—cannot be expected to compete with foreign wages of 15 cents to 35 cents an hour—nor with the $1 an hour wage-fringe-social benefit costs in Japan. Even if wages were reduced to the $1.60 legal minimum, they would, with fringe costs added, be more than double the total current Japanese wage-fringe cost. They would be from 8 to 12 times as much as the prevailing labor costs in Singapore, Hong Kong, South Korea and Taiwan, and 5 times as high as prevailing labor costs in Mexico. Thus, these countries enjoy a "comparative advantage" vis a vis the U.S. by virtue of pitifully substandard wages, with which American wages cannot compete. Nor can they be expected to.

It should also be added that during the Sixties, man-hour productivity in the electrical-electronics industry, averaging about 4 percent a year, exceeded total wage and fringe benefit gains (2.8 percent a year at General Electric and 2.6 percent at Westinghouse). Since annual productivity gains were more than one percent higher than wage-fringe benefit gains, increases in domestic labor costs can hardly have been a decisive factor in stimulating domestic plant closings and in the relocation of U.S. plants overseas.

V. TRADE BALANCE CONSIDERATIONS

The American trade balance was at a breakeven point in 1968, dropping from the "historic" annual U.S. trade surplus of $5 billion. Concern for our declining trade balance has been expressed by the Assistant Secretary of Commerce and by the Department's Bureau of International Commerce. In its study, U.S. Foreign Trade: A Five Year Outlook, BIC points out that, omitting government-financed exports, there was a trade deficit in 1967, amounting to $1.6 billion.

The study also reveals that since 1962 the rate of rise of U.S. imports has outstripped the increase in U.S. exports by a ratio of almost 1½ to 1. During 1962–68, there was a decline in both our total (including government financed) and "commercial" trade surpluses. At least half our trade surplus during these years resulted from government-financed exports. If one were to exclude government-financed exports for 1966–68, the resulting trade balance figures would show a substantial deficit. Each year between 1962 and 1967, there was a sizable annual payments deficit.

The ratio of imports of consumer goods (other than food) and finished manufactures rose rapidly since 1962, and in 1968 accounted for 51 percent of all imports into the U.S. The import value of non-food consumer goods, exclusive of automobiles, rose from $2.3 billion in 1962 to $5.3 billion in 1968. Imports of TV sets, radios, radio-phonographs, etc., which quadrupled between 1962 and 1967, has again doubled. It is essential, according to BIC, to take vigorous action, including, among other things, aggressive and ingenious promotional campaigns, if we are to expand our exports. The U.S. share of world markets, which has been declining, will decline further. A declining U.S. share of growing world markets appears inevitable, and the decline will be evident in practically all geographic areas. The trade deficit for consumer goods (other than food and autos) may nearly double during the 1969–73 period.

The Electrical machinery industry as a whole has always been a "trade surplus" industry, providing the economy with a much needed currency surplus. The extent to which figures are inflated by government-financed exports is unclear but it may amount to several hundred million dollars. In 1966, total industry exports were $1.9 billion, compared with imports of $1.02 billion. Since 1966, exports have climbed 37 percent to an estimated 1969 total of $2.6 billion. But imports have increased far more dramatically, rising 83.7 percent, to an estimated $1.86 billion.

In 1960, the ratio of exports to imports was 3.8 to 1. This ratio fell to 1.9 to 1 in 1966, and to 1.4 to 1 in 1969. No reversal in the declining trend is expected over the next few years. In consumer electronics (TV sets, radios, radio-phonos, tape recorders, etc.), the most seriously affected industry group, the estimated 1969 trade deficit is more than three times the $285 million deficit of 1966.

VI. CONCLUSIONS AND REMEDIES

In today's world of multinational corporations; in a world, that is, in which technology, products, production techniques, and jobs are readily exportable, and in which licensing agreements and joint ventures are common, traditional theories of international trade (laws of comparative advantage), are no longer applicable. And while there is urgent need to expand world trade on a rational basis, so that the world's people may benefit thereby, the growth must be orderly, equitable, and must contribute to real growth in living standards. The benefits to be derived from increased production and broader world distribution are self-evident. If the electrical-electronics industry's products and instruments, from electric lamps to medical computers, were to be produced in sufficient quantities to meet the earth's population basic minimum needs, there would be enough full time employment in all producing countries for the entire foreseeable future. This is an objective devoutly to be pursued. In its pursuit, however, we cannot permit living standards already achieved—as in this country—to be threatened or undermined. Nor can we permit growth industries and the employment they generate to be exported at a time of substantial increases in the labor force, or at a time when we are trying to find jobs for the unemployed and underemployed poor.

Among the remedies we propose are the following:

A truth-in-import labeling act to identify the manufacturer and nation of origin of all imported products.

A tariff on the full value of the unit or product imported, not merely on the so-called "value added."

A clearly defined international program to raise substandard wage levels.

Measures to limit the export of capital, including a tax thereon.

Public ownership of patents developed on public programs and/or with public funds.

Quotas, either voluntary or involuntary limiting the imports, and import growth, of products and components whose rate of import growth since 1966 has exceeded a stated percentage—with provisions for extension to other products and components whenever the rate of import increase during two successive years seems excessive.

Adjustment assistance for all workers displaced by a rise in imports, where the import rise can be shown to be a major or a significantly contributing cause of such displacement.

I and my colleague from Massachusetts, Congressman SILVIO O. CONTE, have been working for years to achieve the kind of remedial measures cited by the AFL–CIO. We have sponsored legislation seeking to limit the importation of electronic products manufactured in foreign nations. We have appealed to the Tariff Commission, to the administration's chief negotiator for international trade, to virtually every governmental body even peripherally related to U.S. trade policy.

But we need help in this effort.

A handful of concerned Congressmen and Senators cannot do the job by themselves.

The entire Congress—or, at the very least, a majority of the Congress—must recognize its responsibility to help safeguard the livelihood of American workers.

With permission, Mr. Speaker, I put in the RECORD at this point a resolution on foreign trade adopted by the AFL–CIO Industrial Union Department and the program for its conference here last week:

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE INDUSTRIAL UNION DEPARTMENT, AFL–CIO, CONVENTION, ATLANTIC CITY, N.J., SEPTEMBER 25–26, 1969

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

American workers are being displaced by foreign imports in ever-increasing numbers. The recent experiences of the textile, apparel, shoe, steel, electronic and ceramic industries, among many others, show that as American corporations export more and more capital to establish foreign operations, the jobs performed by Americans are seriously restricted.

A few statistics emphasize the magnitude of the problem. In the textile industry the volume of imports has more than doubled in the last four years. From 1.5 billion equivalent square yards in 1964, imports mounted to 3.3 billion yards in 1968, when the excess of textile imports over exports amounted to more than $800 million. In the electronics field foreign exports to the United States will increase from $1.3 billion in 1968 to nearly 1.9 billion this year. Hardest hit of all in proportionate terms is the shoe industry, with an import increase from 10 million pairs of footwear in 1956 to 176 million in 1968.

To compound the problem, in the last few years many American conglomerates have become global conglomerates. This U.S. foreign investment is now in excess of $65 million. The AFL–CIO has testified before Congress that this is "a problem with wide-ranging effects on the balance of payments, international trade, and American jobs."

In the last few years, thousands of members of IUD unions have been displaced by the movement of U.S. firms to plants located across the Mexican border. These plants process component parts manufactured in the U.S. They use very low-paid Mexican labor to complete the production process. The final product is then brought back to this country under special tariff arrangements and sold at regular U.S. prices to the American public. Although the cost of production has been reduced substantially, the price to the public generally remains unchanged. The American corporations involved in this traffic are thus exploiting the low-wage Mexican workers, the displaced American workers and the American consumers.

Unfortunately, the Adjustments Assistance provisions of the Trade Expansion Act have been a total failure in assisting workers whose jobs have been displaced by imports. These provisions were a condition of labor's support for the act, but they have been valueless.

Now therefore be it resolved:

1. The Industrial Union Department is in favor of healthy expansion of trade with other nations and the development of greater world markets based on improving the standards of the workers in other countries as well as workers at home. It is not true that all increases in international trade accomplish these objectives.

2. We encourage the U.S. government to establish voluntary multilateral trade agreements when such agreements are essential to American interest In the event of failure or unreasonable delay, or refusal of foreign countries to enter into meaningful multilateral arrangements or comprehensive bilateral agreements, we urge Congress to enact unilateral restraints on imports of selected products adversely affecting American workers.

3. We will work for effective governmental supervisory machinery to control the massive exportation of U.S. capital and technology. Such controls should include taxation and other methods of discouraging the gross and unreasonable outflow of American capital.

4. We urge the U.S. government to establish effective information and reporting requirements to make clear the relationship between foreign investments and trade flow, and to evaluate the impact of the new multinational corporations on trade.

5. We call for repeal of Item 807 in the Tariff Code which permits such unfair practices as are now mushrooming on the Mexican border.

6. We will convene a conference of those unions whose members have been adversely affected by international trade. The conference will also deal in depth with the emerging role of the international corporation and its effect on trade and the American economy.

7. We will seek to expose the fraud perpetrated on American consumers by American corporations which use components and complete units made overseas, at sweatshop wages, with no reduction in price. We will push aggressively for "truth in labeling" as part of our campaign to educate the consumer.

Escape Clause, Anti-Dumping and Other Temporary Relief Against Imports.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend my good friend and colleague from Massachusetts for his remarks and add my own unqualified pledge to work with him in this fight to preserve the jobs of those at the Sickles plant in Chicopee, which are now threatened by increased competition from the cheap labor markets of Taiwan and Portugal.

With regard to the damage already done, I intend to work closely with union representatives who are now preparing a petition for readjustment allowances to aid those workers already displaced.

As long as we are threatened by these imports from cheap labor markets, however, preventive measures will be needed. The bill, H.R. 9274, which I introduced a year ago, would insure an equitable sharing of the U.S. electronics market between foreign and domestic goods. Having visited Taiwan last summer, I can report to you, Mr. Speaker, that there are women and children in these plants not only working for paltry wages, but also, in many cases, without adequate industrial safety devices. It seems to be extremely shortsighted, as well as detrimental to the domestic American industry, for American companies to continue to go abroad to produce products that, when sold here, threaten the livelihood of our own employees.

On a related subject, Mr. Speaker, I fully support the recent suit filed by Westinghouse Electric against six foreign countries which are dumping large transformers on the American market at prices much lower than they charge in their own markets. When this illegal practice is compounded by the denial of the right to permit American transformers to be sold in their countries, this discrimination becomes intolerable.

Only this week I met with officials in Pittsfield, where G.E. has one of the largest power transformer plants in the Nation, to assure them of my continued support.

Mr. Speaker, I was represented at the recent outstanding conference of "The Developing Crisis in International Trade," sponsored by the Industrial Union Department of the AFL–CIO. Their seminars on these and other subjects provided valuable information on the dimensions of the crisis and the need for more effective remedies.

I join with my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts in his determination to prevent the wholesale dismantling of the domestic electronics industry by unfair foreign competition.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may revise and extend their remarks on the special order given today by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

GOVERNMENT SHOULD BE ASHAMED OF ITS NEGLECT OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

(Mr. MOSS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, while violation of the law cannot be condoned, the events that led up to the current action of the postal workers, must be carefully considered in context with some pertinent history. I recall, as a freshman Member of this body, the times when I argued in favor of increases for postal workers under the threat of presidential veto and I must say that that experience has been repeated many times.

In the current instance this body adopted necessary postal pay increase legislation. We did so not only under a threat of presidential veto, but under the lash of demand that postal reform be included. Reality is that the two are not intertwined. They should, and indeed must stand alone and be considered on individual merit.

We have waited far too long to render unto the postal workers that which is overdue. There is no question that the salary of these dedicated public servants is not in any way equitable nor is there any question that a postal employee deserves adequate compensation to live a life of dignity and to provide for his family opportunities for a better life.

I am including in the RECORD at this point an editorial which was printed on Friday, March 20, in the Sacramento Bee. I commend it heartily for the consideration of my colleagues, as follows:

GOVERNMENT SHOULD BE ASHAMED OF ITS NEGLECT OF POSTAL EMPLOYES

The illegal and paralyzing strike by postal workers in New York and elsewhere cannot be dismissed by mere denunciation of the letter carriers for defiance of federal law banning such strikes. The sequence of cause and effect events which galvanized the extreme action by postal employes stems directly to the government's mishandling of the whole issue of postal wages and reform of the postal department.

First, of course, the strike demonstrates the uneven consequences of such disruption of public services by public employes. The innocent public becomes the major victim of the issue. Government itself is not hit in the pocketbook, as in the case of strikes in the private sector.

Yet in another sense the public is a party to the dispute in that the elected leadership in Congress created the conditions which postal employes found intolerable in the extreme.

In early February, President Richard Nixon conceded that postal employes, along with all other federal workers, were entitled to a 5.75 per cent cost of living pay increase. But he refused to recommend it on grounds it would spur inflation. He offered a 5.4 per cent increase to rank and file mailmen but only if it were tied to his proposed controversial reform of the postal department which would create a semi-independent postal corporation to be called the postal authority.

At the same time, rank and file postal employes labor under one of the lowest wage systems in the country. A letter carrier makes $6,100 to start and reaches only $8,442 after 21 years of service. The starting pay in the New York area is under the government's own poverty level index for a family of four which is $6,700. The government ought to be ashamed it lets such a situation exist.

Simple justice and federal law required the administration to provide equitable wages for the mailmen. A law was enacted several years ago which requires the government to meet comparable wage scales in private industry.

Nixon was wrong in tying his proffered wage increase to the postal reform proposal, a matter he knew faced uncertain congressional treatment. Mailmen should not have been made the pawns in the reform struggle. Their strike is illegal but the administration cannot shrug off its responsibility in the matter.

PRESIDENT NIXON ON NONDISCRIMINATORY SCHOOL SYSTEM

(Mr. MIZELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MIZELL. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, President Nixon made public his feelings on a subject that is important to all Americans, that being school desegregation and the effect it has on our educational system. I want to commend the President for speaking out as he did on such a controversial and complicated subject. It was evident to me that he, throughout his statement, had the welfare of our children in mind, and that his first consideration as he confronts the problem of school desegregation is quality education.

I was very happy to hear that Mr. Nixon feels that the neighborhood school should be the basis for solving our problems, and that the busing of students for the purpose of achieving racial balance should not be required.

Many of us have been confronted with the problem of school desegregation on a more direct and personal basis than others, and many of us have tried to find solutions to this great problem. I personally, along with 18 cosponsors, introduced a bill dealing with this subject last month. I was very happy to see that the President's statement and my Nondiscriminatory Education Act, H.R. 16083, were in almost total agreement. Pages 13 and 14 of the President's statement deal with administration policy as it relates to the enforcement of school desegregation laws. I have taken each of the statements in this section and compared them with my bill. In all but one area, that dealing with teacher assignment, the Presidential statement agrees with my Nondiscriminatory Education Act. The following is a list of the President's policies in regard to "Principles of Enforcement" and how they compare with my bill:

President's statement: Deliberate racial segregation of pupils by official action is unlawful, wherever it exists. In the words of the Supreme Court, it must be eliminated "root and branch"—and must be eliminated at once.

Mizell bill: Title III, Sec. 301(a) "The operation of any school system receiving public support other than a non-discriminatory school system shall be illegal."

President's statement: Segregation of teachers must be eliminated. To this end, each school system in this nation, North and South, East and West, must move immediately, as the Supreme Court has ruled, toward a goal under which "in each school the ratio of White to Negro faculty members is substantially the same as it is throughout the system."

Mizell bill: This is the one area where the Administration's views and the Mizell bill differ. Title I Sec. 104 requires the placement of faculty members on a "non-discriminatory" basis only, without regard to race, creed, color, etc. It does not, however, force teacher transfers based on district-wide racial percentages.

President's statement: With respect to school facilities, school administrators throughout the nation, North and South, East and West, must move immediately, also in conformance with the court's ruling, to assure that schools within individual school districts do not discriminate with respect to the quality of facilities or the quality of education delivered to the children within the district.

Mizell bill: Title II Sec. 201 . . . "A nondiscriminatory system is one in which there is no force or discrimination present, based on race, creed, color, religion or national origin, in establishing the make-up of the student body, the faculty or in the allocation of funds, books and facilities to the respective schools.

President's statement: In devising local compliance plans, primary weight should be given to the considered judgment of school boards—provided they act in good faith and within Constitutional limits.

Mizell bill: The entire Mizell bill is devoted to local administration of school business with no Federal interference as long as the local school boards carry out their business in a non-discriminatory manner. The Mizell bill enhances the so-called "good faith" policy.

President's statement: The neighborhood school will be deemed the most appropriate base for such a system.

Mizell bill: Title I Sec. 101 "The right of elementary and secondary education students to attend their neighborhood schools shall not be abridged by any Federal authority based upon race, creed, color, religion or national origin of the student."

President's statement: Transportation of pupils beyond normal geographic school zones for the purpose of achieving racial balance will not be required.

Mizell bill: Forcing a child to leave his neighborhood school to attend another more distant because of his race, color, creed, religion, or national origin shall be illegal.

President's statement: Federal advice and assistance will be made available on request, but Federal officials shall not go beyond the requirements of the law in attempting to impose their own judgment on the local school district.

Mizell bill: Under the Mizell bill, Federal assistance could be utilized in the formulation of local school plans, but Federal authorities could in no way interfere uninvited as long as the local school boards are acting in a non-discriminatory manner.

President's statement: School Boards will be encouraged to be flexible and creative in formulating plans that are educationally sound and that result in effective desegregation.

Mizell bill: Throughout the Mizell bill, school boards are required to act in a non-discriminatory manner and it is left up to the individual school boards to draw boundaries under the non-discriminatory restriction. Federal encouragement is welcomed, but if the boards are acting in a non-discriminatory manner, Federal interference would be illegal.

President's statement: Racial imbalance in a school system may be partially de jure in origin, and partly de facto. In such a case, it is appropriate to insist on remedy for the de jure portion, which is unlawful, without insisting on a remedy for the lawful de facto portion.

Mizell bill: The Mizell bill, because of its non-discriminatory features, actually eliminates de jure segregation or any laws that would establish or perpetuate segregation in the school systems. School zones would be established so that the schools serve their geographic constituency in a non-discriminatory manner. Any segregation existing under the Mizell bill would be due to housing patterns or de facto.

President's statement: De facto racial separation, resulting from housing patterns, exist in the South as well as the North; in neither area should this condition by itself be cause for Federal enforcement actions. De jure segregation, brought about by deliberate school board gerrymandering exists in the North as well as the South; in both areas this must be remedied. In all respects the law should be applied equally North, South, East and West.

Mizell bill: The Mizell bill states that school zones must serve the needs of the community and must be drawn in a non-discriminatory manner, without regard to the race, creed, color, religion or national origin of the students. This in itself would make the gerrymandering the President is speaking of illegal.

CHANGES IN POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

(Mr. CARTER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, last December 20, 1969, I spoke on certain changes being proposed and implemented in the Post Office Department. I have continued in my efforts to understand why these changes are being made, but after an exhaustive research I am unable to come to any satisfactory conclusion.

It is common knowledge that the Post Office Department is in need of reform and one must commend this administration and the Committee on Post Offices for their dedication in trying to do something about this archaic system that has managed to break even only 17 times in its history. For the past 3 years, the Department's losses have come to over $1 billion annually, and I am ready to support reform legislation that will correct this deplorable situation.

The Postmaster General has used his executive authority to bring about a number of administrative reforms that would be part of procedures proposed in his new legislation. I would like to bring a few facts to your attention so that you might understand what in practice the reform bill proposes.

We all know that the Post Office suffers from a lack of good service and efficiency, and these problems exist, primarily, in our large urban areas. The Postmaster General has said as much publicly, but any evidence of improvements in these areas is yet to be presented. To the contrary, we see these areas closed down by an illegal strike. What has become evident is a further decline in service and efficiency in my own congressional district, which is characteristically rural.

As in most rural areas, there are many rural and star route carriers in my district. The star route carriers' contracts were due for renewal last July, and instead of a 4-year contract, which was given in the past, they received a 6-month extension. Approximately a month before Christmas, these carriers were notified that their last day of work would be the day after Christmas; their assistance was needed to get the Christmas mail delivered, but that would be the final need for their services.

This news saddened me greatly, for the majority of these carriers had given over 25 years of dedicated service to the Post Office. Most of them were in excess of 50 years of age with some being over 60. They are good men who had compiled flawless records of service. Since they were private contractors, their services could be terminated, but the hard facts are that these men are upward in years, they live in an economically depressed area where unemployment is high and new jobs are scarce. The Post Office later extended their contracts, but it is inevitable, under present policy, that they finally be terminated.

The Post Office's action was questioned and they replied that it was necessary for improved service and efficiency. This may have been their reason for initiating such action, but the results do not justify these changes.

In a few cases, the carriers were not as fortunate, and their contracts were not renewed. In cases where the contracts were not extended, several routes were combined into one. This, of course, meant that star carriers were losing their jobs and one man would have a heavier workload. Those routes whose carriers did not receive extensions were very similar to those where administrative changes were made. I took this as an opportunity to investigate first-hand some of the reforms Postmaster Blount had proposed to Congress. Since his proposals are theoretical answers to our problems, I considered these changes as pilot programs which make possible our evaluation of them as they actually apply to the realities of postal problems.

If services improved at a lower cost, I could understand why the Postmaster desired these changes; and, although it would still be regrettable that these gentlemen of long service would be without work, there would be some justification for the changes. The desired results of our Postmaster General, however, were not evident.

One example investigated was in Adair County, and this study is illustrative of other such cases across the district. Two carriers lost their positions and their duties were placed on one man. Rather than saving money under the new contract, it was discovered that the new contract cost more than the total the previous carriers received. Here is an example of the Post Office's reform which is directed toward saving money, and it, in fact, cost more.

A similar investigation was conducted to determine whether the new procedure improved services, and it had not. The patrons along this route had been accustomed to receiving their mail in the mornings, and now it was delivered as late as 5, 6, or 7 o'clock in the evening. This is after sunset, and many of these patrons live a good distance from the road where their boxes are located. Their choice is to either cross rough terrain in the dark and risk injury, for many of them are our elder citizens, or to leave their mail in the boxes overnight and risk vandalism. Others complain of misdeliveries to their neighbors' boxes, infrequent pickup of mail, discontinuance of services, such as selling stamps, and so forth. The list of grievances could go on, and it all means that not only has the cost gone up but service has fallen to an all-time low.

I recently received a letter from the publisher of the Middlesboro Daily News, and he states that it takes first class mail 6 days to go 56 miles, but his primary complaint is a proposed change in his area that will reroute mail to where a letter or newspaper which is to be delivered to communities 16 and 30 miles away will be sent along a route totalling 360 miles. The reasons for such a proposal are, it is assumed, increased efficiency and service. I hope the postal authorities are correct, but I cannot see how they are, since it will make his daily news completely out of date by the time it arrives.

These are factual examples of what the changes would be like if the Postmaster General is allowed the reforms he asks us to enact. These are changes which I can never endorse, and I urge Mr. Blount to rescind such actions.

Another part of the reform legislation would no longer require the appointment of postmasters to be confirmed by the Senate. I have no desire to perpetuate the congressional appointive system, but I will defend those who have been appointed under such a system.

In the 5 years I have served here in Congress, there has never been a mention of malfeasance on the part of a postal employee in my district. These men have passed a difficult civil service test, their character and reputation have been reviewed and approved, and in all cases they have performed in a manner which would make the Senate proud of their selection. It is the desire of the Congress and of our Nation to improve conditions in the Post Office, and if a change in this procedure is necessary, then one must act accordingly. However, good reasons must be shown, and the alternative procedure must not only appear to be an improvement, but must actually carry out those goals upon which we have focused our attention.

The new system proposed by the Postmaster General would create National and Regional Management Selection Boards which will in turn recommend appointments of postmasters. These boards have already been created and are making recommendations, but postal authorities have classified their actions as secret. For reasons which cannot be explained, it is impossible to discover whom they recommend, but one would think that if their selections are based on merit, ability and good character, then such selections should withstand any public query.

Procedures presently being used to appoint postmasters are also cause for alarm. In my own Commonwealth of Kentucky there have been 72 postmasters appointed as temporary officers-in-charge. Neither these nor the other 2,100 appointments have been presented to the Senate for confirmation. Although our population places us at 22 among the other States, we rate as the seventh most active State for postal changes. One can only assume that those changes are best for the Post Office Department, but there is reason to fear such an assumption will prove fallacious, for wherever one looks for evidence to confirm this belief he will be discouraged.

It is extremely regrettable that the Postmaster General has decided to disregard the law and make appointments without Senate confirmation, as is presently required. It is my considered opinion that high Government officials have no more right to disregard those laws they disagree with than other men. It seems, however, that the Postmaster General has created his Management Selection Boards, that they are making recommendations, that he is appointing their nominees as temporary postmasters-in-charge, and that they, for all practical reasons, are postmasters with all the duties and benefits of those postmasters who previously went before the Senate to have their qualifications reviewed and confirmed. Although the veil of secrecy which surrounds these appointments makes it impossible to draw a factual conclusion, the clear implication is that the Postmaster General has every intention of showing his disrespect for the Senate and the law by instituting his own reform, although it has never been enacted by Congress. I know of no other case where confirmation of the Senate is necessary, and the nominee has been allowed to assume his position for 2 years without confirmation. This causes serious doubt as to the validity of our Postmaster General's actions.

These remarks should in no way be construed as my doubting the qualifications of the new appointees, for I know many of them personally and would consider it an honor to expedite their permanent appointment. I am also cognizant, however, of temporary officers who have repeatedly failed their examinations but continue in office, therefore, blocking the appointment of applicants who have passed stiff requirements. I know, also, of cases where the "temporary" officer-in-charge acquired his position through political consideration from outgoing postmasters. These are appointments which the Postmaster General has elected to make while espousing a reform approach which rewards ability and discounts politics. These are cases which illustrate the abominable application of the proposed panacea to postal problems.

Several conclusions can be made from those investigations which should be of interest to all of us. First, the reforms encompassed in the Postal Corporation are more expensive than the present system. Second, the service declines at a faster rate than at present. Third, many postal employees, including star route carriers, rural route carriers, postmasters of second-, third-, and fourth-class post offices, will be terminated. As was stated earlier, I am ready to support any postal reform legislation that will improve postal service, but the present legislation is not the answer. These investigations also illustrate how the proposals will result in terminating the positions of many employees who work in the rural areas of our country.

TRIBUTE TO HON. CHET HOLIFIELD

(Mr. ALBERT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, for more than 22 years I have had the pleasure to serve in the House with the gentleman from California (Mr. HOLIFIELD). During those years I have at all times found him to be fair in his dealings with his colleagues, forceful and well-prepared in debate, and diligent in meeting his committee responsibilities. It is apparent as well that his efforts have been approved by the people of his 19th Congressional District in California.

Because of his moderate but progressive approach to issues, Congressman HOLIFIELD holds the respect of his colleagues on both sides of the aisle. He is a man of principle and commitment, and his commitments are as good as his word. He has also refused to "soapbox" issues of fleeting but popular appeal, preferring to work in areas of less glamor but much greater importance to the Nation. His contribution in the field of nuclear energy will come to be recognized, in my opinion, as "statesmanlike" in the classic sense of the word.

Congressman HOLIFIELD is the dean of the California congressional delegation. This prestigious position has been held by only a handful of men over the years. It is a tribute to a man who has worked hard and long for California and the Nation. These few men like the gentleman from California (Mr. HOLIFIELD) who have made the House the great institution that it is, have made singular contributions to the Nation through their tenure and committee positions. I think it would be fitting at this point in the RECORD to insert a summary of Congressman HOLIFIELD's distinguished public record:

CONGRESSIONAL SERVICE AND COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENTS

Congressman Chet Holifield, who represents the 19th District of California, resides in Montebello, California. He was born in Kentucky, educated in the public schools of Arkansas, and has lived in Montebello, California, since 1920. He has been engaged in the retailing of men's clothing for over 40 years. He is a member of the Christian Church and various fraternal and civic organizations. Chet Holifield and his popular and attractive wife, Cam, have four daughters and 15 grandchildren.

He was elected to the 78th Congress in 1942 to represent the newly formed 19th Congressional District and has served his constituency continuously since then. He has been re-elected by overwhelming majorities of votes in each of his 14 elections. Because of his 14 terms in Congress, he is in the 9th seniority group in rank. Congressman Holifield's work for his constituents has won approval and commendations from substantial organizations such as the Los Angeles Board of Supervisors, City Councils, the Metropolitan Water District, and his efforts have been endorsed by countless civic groups, business organizations, labor unions, veterans groups, and government employee associations. His record on behalf of civil liberties for all citizens regardless of race, color, or creed is unsurpassed.

Congressman Holifield is now serving as Chairman of the important Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. He is the acting Chairman of the House Committee on Government Operations and will succeed to the Chairmanship in January, 1971, due to the retirement of the present Chairman. He is also serving as the Chairman of the Military Operations Subcommittee of the Government Operations Committee.

An indication of the respect for his integrity and judgment that his colleagues in Congress have for Congressman Holifield, was his appointment by the Speaker, the Honorable John W. McCormack, to serve on the new committee on Congressional ethics, the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct.

Congressman Holifield's Subcommittee on Military Operations has for many years investigated waste and inefficiency in the Department of Defense. As a result of those investigations, Mr. Holifield introduced a bill to establish a blue ribbon commission of 12 members to make a study of all Federal procurement practices and procedures in order to eliminate waste of the taxpayers money. That bill was passed and subsequently signed by the President. Speaker McCormack has appointed Mr. Holifield as one of the two House members to serve on the Commission on Government Procurement.

As a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, since its beginning in 1946, Congressman Holifield has been outstandingly active in the field of atomic energy legislation. Hearings that he has held as a member of this committee have developed the most far-reaching information of the effect of radiation on man and the problems of civil defense in the case of an atomic war.

Congressman Holifield always has insisted on civilian rather than military control of the atom. He is a constant and vigorous proponent of a strong atomic defense for the United States and has worked for a strong program of research to develop the peaceful uses of atomic energy. The Congressman has always insisted that the benefits of atomic research and development be safeguarded for the benefit of the private citizens of the United States whose taxes have been invested so heavily in this huge enterprise.

As the ranking member of the House Committee on Government Operations he has been responsible for some of the most important developments in good government over the past century. He authorized the legislation which established the General Services Administration, that body which does most of the purchasing for the civil departments of government.

He served on the Hoover Commission which recommended 45 Presidential Reorganization Plans and he helped in the passage of 39 of these Plans into law. During the 89th Congress, Congressman Holifield held hearings and managed a bill which created the Department of Housing and Urban Development and made its chairman a member of the President's Cabinet.

In 1966 Congressman Holifield authored a bill which created the Department of Transportation, another cabinet level department. Thus, he became the only Representative in our history to manage legislation creating two Cabinet-level departments. These departments have allowed the government to modernize itself and keep up with our rapidly changing times.

In 1967 Mr. Holifield managed the President's Reorganization Plan for the District of Columbia, creating a mayor-council form of government, the first major reform of the national capital's governmental machinery in over 90 years.

PUBLIC SERVICE AWARDS AND RECOGNITION

The California Congressoional Recognition Plan is a privately endowed, nonprofit educational organization whose purpose is the improvement of public understanding of the records and services of the California Delegation in Congress. This group has cited Congressman Holifield nine times as an outstanding member of the Delegation.

The academic world has honored Congressman Holifield three times by awarding him honorary degrees: Whittier College, Doctor of Laws; East Los Angeles College, Associate of Arts; Lynchburg College Doctor of Laws. In 1967 he received the coveted Congressional Distinguished Service Award of the American Political Science Association. This honor is given only every other year to two Congressmen, one from each party, for exceptional and outstanding public service.

Chairman Holifield is known as "a Congressman who does his homework" and because of his hard work, attention to detail and expert knowledge, he has been signally honored. He was elected to serve on President Truman's Special Evaluation Commission on the Atomic Bomb Tests at Bikini Atoll in 1946. He has served as Congressional Advisor to the United States Delegation at most of the International Conferences on the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy in Geneva, Switzerland. He also has been chosen to represent the United States at several of the General Conferences of the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna, Austria, and Tokyo, Japan, and has served as Advisor to the U.S. Delegation, First International Symposium on Water Desalinization, and the Conference of the Committee on Disarmament in Geneva, Switzerland four times.

In addition to the other honors which have come to Mr. Holifield, he was the only Member of the House of Representatives, other than the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, designated to represent the United States at the Dedication of the German peoples' memorial to General George Marshall at Bonn in October, 1963.

President Johnson requested Mr. Holifield to chair an ad hoc committee of Western Senators and Representatives to develop an agreement between privately owned and publicly owned utilities to use in California and Arizona the excess electrical power from the Bonneville Dam in Washington State. Because of his work, for which he has been commended by both the utilities and the President, California and Arizona now receive about 3 million kilowatts of cheap, smog-free electricity from Bonneville through the Pacific Intertie.

Congressman Holifield's extensive knowledge of the Federal Government and atomic energy has been recognized by the media. He has been a guest on such nation-wide programs as "Meet the Press," "The Today Show," "Face the Nation," and various special news programs. He has been the subject of many articles in national magazines: Saturday Review, Fortune, Saturday Evening Post, Reader's Digest, Nations Business, and Atlantic Monthly, among others.

Congressman Holifield's 28 years of service in the House of Representatives have earned him a position of high seniority and leadership. The honors and responsibilities which have come to Mr. Holifield have given him wide knowledge and experience and have earned him the respect and confidence of his colleagues, the other leaders of Congress and of the Executive Department.

CONGRESSIONAL SENIORITY AND SPECIFIC SERVICES TO CONSTITUENTS IN THE 19TH DISTRICT

Congressman Holifield is Dean of the California delegation and because of his seniority and leadership ability he has been in an excellent position to guide legislation of importance to California and to the Nation through difficult debates on the Floor of the House of Representatives. During the 90th Congress, he was instrumental in winning a major victory in the battle against air pollution. Aided by his skillful leadership, the House voted to permit California to set air pollution standards which are stricter than those imposed by the Federal Government. Mr. Holifield "mapped the strategy" for the Floor fight on the California Amendment and with the help of his California colleagues, secured passage of the legislation.

The 19th Congressional District, which he is privileged to represent, has always been Mr. Holifield's foremost concern. As a result of his efforts, the District has benefited in many ways. He was able to obtain over a million dollars for flood control in the district; he has helped all of the school districts obtain Federal funds for special projects. He helped obtain funds from the Office of Economic Opportunity for the newly established Rio Hondo Community Action Council. He has obtained funds for the Montebello Transit System, Montebello and Cerritos public libraries, Whittier College science building, and many other worthy District projects. Through his help, Norwalk has acquired park land and Pico Rivera, a Municipal Golf Course. Mr. Holifield was credited by the Former Secretary of Transportation as being largely responsible for obtaining 90% of the funds for the new Century Freeway.

Mr. Holifield has been a staunch advocate of Federal grants to the schools of his district and has secured many thousands of dollars in administrative educational facility grants and student loans under Federal guarantees.

Of late many public officials have discovered "Pollution of Air and Water" and have stated publicly their concern. In November of 1965, Congressman Holifield spoke before the American Association for Contamination Control on the dangers and hazards of Contamination of Man's Environment. For years he has been urging the pollution free production of electrical energy by means of atomic generators. His work on the 1967 Air Quality Act has been noted. These are just other indications of his foresight and concern for the public welfare.

In addition to obtaining Federal funds for Post Offices, hospitals, libraries, community facilities, and a clean environment, Congressman Holifield has assisted many thousands of people in his district in the problems that they had with the various branches of the Federal Government. Through his full-time, competently staffed Field Office, located in Pico Rivera, Congressman Holifield has provided assistance to businessmen who were contracting with the Federal Government, people who had problems with the Veterans' Administration, Social Security, the Armed Forces, Internal Revenue, Immigration Services, and almost all branches of the Government. Numerous letters of appreciation from grateful residents indicate the importance of this kind of Congressional work.

COMMENDATION OF PRESIDENT NIXON FOR PROPOSAL TO DEAL WITH ILLEGAL HANDLING OF EXPLOSIVES

(Mr. GERALD R. FORD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. GERALD R. FORD. Mr. Speaker, legislation being sent to Congress by President Nixon to make a Federal crime of the illegal possession, use, and interstate transporting of explosives should be dealt with on an emergency basis.

The times are critical and call for immediate action. I believe the strong penalties proposed by the President to deal with the rash of bombings we have witnessed are appropriate to the problem.

The punishment the President has proposed fits the crime. Whether upon enactment it will serve as a deterrent to the commission of such crimes by the highly irrational individuals who engage in terrorist bombings remains to be seen. But certainly it will assist State and local authorities if the investigative powers of the FBI are brought to bear on the situation by greatly broadening the scope of existing Federal law dealing with the illegal handling of explosives.

I commend the President for this most timely effort.

PRESIDENT TAKES A STRONG SENSIBLE APPROACH TO PROBLEMS OF INTEGRATION

(Mr. GERALD R. FORD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. GERALD R. FORD. Mr. Speaker, the President has taken a strong sensible approach to the problems of integration.

Certainly the President's commitment to upholding the law of the land cannot be questioned, particularly in view of his willingness to earmark $1.5 billion in Federal funds to help local school districts with their desegregation problems. I applaud the President's pledge to help make desegregation work. At the same time I agree completely with his position that the neighborhood school is the cornerstone of the local school system and that students should not be bused outside of their neighborhoods merely to achieve an artificial racial balance in schools. Like the President, I believe that funds spent on forcible busing of students might better be spent on improving the quality of education in our elementary and secondary schools. The President's statement was noteworthy for its honesty and realism.

MR. ACHESON ON RHODESIA

(Mr. GROSS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with the American people the views of former Secretary of State Dean Acheson on the ill-considered closing of this country's consulate in the Republic of Rhodesia, and thus the severing of diplomatic relations with that friendly nation.

Mr. Acheson was kind enough to express himself on this subject in a letter to me on March 23, 1970. As is customary with him, he gets right to the point by saying:

I regard this action as a grave mistake.

His letter continues as follows:

The newspapers reported that Mr. Michael Stewart, the British Foreign Secretary, called in our ambassador and told him that the British Government, which in the Foreign Secretary's view was sovereign in Rhodesia, wished the United States to withdraw its consulate from this part of Her Majesty's domain. Presumably the State Department recommended to the President, who under the Constitution conducts our foreign relations, that we should bow to this wish. Presumably also the African Bureau of the State Department (which surprisingly is staffed by the personnel appointed by Assistant Secretary Mennen Williams during the Kennedy Administration) formulated this recommendation because it disapproves of the new constitution that was recently put into effect by the Government of Rhodesia.

Thus I think it fair to assume that the action was based upon and will have the effect of perpetuating two myths. The first is that Queen Elizabeth II is the sovereign in Rhodesia and that Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom does exercise control over that country. The second is that external action both political and economic, short of military conquest, can and will induce the Rhodesians to change their ways and adopt the principle of one-man-one-vote, which so far as I know is not in effective operation anywhere in Africa.

The trouble with perpetuating myths is that they lead those who perpetuate them further and further from reality. They are a sort of political LSD, inducing the taker to live in a world of dreams. They also have another and far more malignant quality of LSD. They can ultimately destroy the user's capacity to think rationally.

Recently the Senate of the United States wisely and almost unanimously endorsed the view that having relations with a foreign state does not in any way indicate approval of its domestic institutions or conduct. Rhodesia is friendly to the United States. Economic relations with Rhodesia are greatly to our benefit. To alienate that country by an attempt to force it to do what is both impossible and beyond any proper concern of our government is worse than a crime; it is a blunder.

There is also a view current in the United Nations circles that to prevent the dominating Afro-Asian communist bloc in the United Nations from recommending courses that are both extreme and unwise we should join them in courses that are less extreme but equally unwise. I would characterize this view as stupid.

Sincerely yours,

DEAN ACHESON.

Mr. Speaker, that describes the situation in a nutshell, and I commend Mr. Acheson. The sooner the Nixon administration stops taking this "political LSD" and returns to reality by formally and fully recognizing the Republic of Rhodesia and its government, the better off we all will be.

In that regard, Mr. Acheson notes with surprise—as do I—that the President is being advised by a State Department crew put together by G. Mennen Williams—the same Williams and the same crew that presumably gave former President Johnson the sorry advice that led to our present spineless policy. Where is the State Department housecleaning that was promised the American people in the fall of 1968? It is shockingly overdue.

HAS STATE DEPARTMENT PROBE BEEN KILLED?

(Mr. GROSS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Evening Star has published in the past few days two interesting accounts dealing with an investigation conducted by White House Special Counsel Clark Mollenhoff into allegations that State Department bureaucrats deliberately sabotaged the President's efforts to settle the Biafran war.

This type of sabotage is not unknown in the executive branch of Government, and is widely believed to be most prevalent among the "Foggy Bottom" set.

The two Star articles were interesting, also, in that the second one states that the Mollenhoff investigation has suddenly—and somewhat mysteriously—been cancelled.

I do not know the identity of the Star's White House source of the statement that the investigation has been stopped.

But I would certainly suppose that Secretary of State Rogers would be most anxious for it to continue full speed. If he were not, I would be more than a little surprised.

I am reminded that the Secretary is scheduled to testify before the Foreign Affairs Committee in the near future and perhaps at that time he will enlighten us on whether the blinders have been put on Mr. Mollenhoff as the newspaper states they have.

I include the two articles for insertion in the RECORD at this point:

DO U.S. DIPLOMATS SET OWN POLICY?

(By James Boyle)

Special Counsel Clark Mollenhoff of the White House staff is conducting a low-keyed inquiry into the State Department's role—or lack of it—in the execution of foreign policy.

Mollenhoff has zeroed in on U.S. policy toward Nigeria and Biafra as a wedge to explore a larger question: Whether entrenched career diplomats have thwarted Nixon's attempts to change American foreign policy.

There is no reason to believe that Mollenhoff is acting on behalf of President Nixon and his national security adviser, Henry A. Kissinger. He has been given a good deal of independence to act as an informal inspector general to protect the President's interests throughout the bureaucracy.

But the disenchantment between White House and State Department that has affected every recent administration has taken hold again. Relations between Kissinger's National Security Council staff and the top layer of the State Department have become strained in recent months.

Some but not all of this strain was caused by deep differences between the two in the aftermath of Biafra's surrender, and charges that the State Department's estimate of the situation did not accurately reflect the extent of starvation in the country.

Influential critics of the department within the Republican party have charged that the State Department was guilty of negligence and insubordination because it failed to fully support Nixon, who was urging the Nigerian government to accept immediate and massive relief for Biafra.

Mollenhoff has drawn up a series of questions concerning the department's handling of policy toward Biafra. And while White House sources stress that the inquiry is not intended to become an inquisition or a purge, the questions raised are intended to suggest to the top political appointees at State that they may have allowed career subordinates to thwart presidential wishes.

The questions were apparently prompted by public charges issued by the Ripon Society, a national organization of young liberal members of the Republican party.

Members of the Ripon hierarchy studied the Biafra controversy and concluded, in a lengthy article in their latest monthly magazine, that Nixon had attempted to reverse U.S. policy on Nigeria after he took office, but was thwarted by career diplomats on the African desk.

It is not clear how Mollenhoff became involved. He is considered to be far more conservative than the Ripon Society membership.

But their central complaint is one that has frequently been stated in the past by conservatives: That career diplomats have set out deliberately to change policy unknown to the President or against his wishes.

As an investigative reporter for the Des Moines Register before joining the administration, Mollenhoff frequently wrote about the State Department in similar cases.

The cause of Biafra drew a good deal of support from both conservatives and liberals. During his 1968 campaign Nixon charged that the Johnson administration was allowing diplomatic red tape to interfere with a massive United States relief effort to feed the civilians in the war zone.

His position was roughly the same as that of Democratic Sens. Edward M. Kennedy and Eugene McCarthy. Near the end of the Johnson administration relief efforts were stepped up.

SPECIAL ENVOY

Early in his administration Nixon appointed a special ambassador, C. Clyde Ferguson, to handle Biafra relief. He also spoke for the first time of American aims as a "negotiated end to the conflict," as opposed to the position that Biafra should surrender and be returned to central Nigeria, which is eventually what happened.

Mollenhoff is investigating the Ripon allegation that it was not until eight months later that the State Department began considering a compromise settlement rather than surrender.

He is also asking State to explain whether it disregarded the evidence of starvation submitted in a report by a nutritionist hired by the department. It showed the highest rates of edema, a degenerative disease, ever recorded in food-scarce areas.

THREE REPORTED UNDER FIRE

The general thrust of Mollenhoff's inquiry is to suggest that the State Department omitted from reports to the White House important information that would have supported the need for immediate U.S. action, and to pose the question of whether the department reacted with a deliberate lack of speed it carrying out presidential directives.

The three persons who reportedly come under fire are Undersecretary of State Elliot L. Richardson, Ambassador Ferguson, and William H. Brubeck, director of the Nigerian section of the department.

A source in the department said today that no inquiries had yet been received from Mollenhoff, and that the undersecretary's office was not aware of Mollenhoff's effort.

And the department repeated an earlier denial that any rift exists with the White House over the conduct of Nigeria policy.

"There is close and continuing cooperation," said a State Department spokesman, Carl Bartch.

But in recent weeks the strain between the National Security Council staff and the top State Department staff reportedly has increased.

Both prepared drafts of Nixon's "State of the World" message delivered to Congress on Feb. 18, but the secretary of state withdrew his version from consideration.

The cover story at the time was that it had been too closely parallel to the White House version to serve as a supplement, and would be reworked as a country-by-country blue-print.

Kissinger and the President are said to have rejected it as unacceptable and poorly drawn.

MOLLENHOFF'S INQUIRY GETS ACTION—THE AX

(By James Doyle)

President Nixon's assistant for national security affairs, Henry A. Kissinger, was "upset" when he picked up a newspaper Thursday and read that another presidential assistant, Special Counsel Clerk Mollenhoff, had begun an inquiry into the State Department's handling of U.S. policy toward Nigeria and Biafra.

As a result, the inquiry disappeared over the weekend.

Neither Kissinger nor President Nixon was aware that Mollenhoff had drawn up a series of questions for submission to the State Department.

The questions concerned charges by the liberal Republican Ripon Society that the State Department mismanaged the United States role in the Nigeria-Biafra war, especially the opportunity to move food into the ravaged Biafran enclaves when they finally fell to Nigerian forces.

White House press Secretary Ronald L. Ziegler acknowledged Mollenhoff's inquiry at a press briefing Thursday afternoon.

But Saturday a White House official, clearly authorized to speak for the administration, invited a reporter to his office and made this statement:

"Mr. Mollenhoff is not looking into State Department actions on Nigeria-Biafra policy, or any other State Department actions.

"Any discussion of the State Department staff would be coordinated through the secretary of state. Anything along that line would be directly through the auspices of the secretary of state, and the White House would not go into it without clearing it with the secretary."

The official was reminded that Ziegler had acknowledged the Mollenhoff inquiry on Thursday. "I can tell you that there is no inquiry," he repeated.

In the cold language of the administration spokesman, it would appear that Clark Mollenhoff had been admonished, and that at least part of his charter had been revoked.

When he left his job as investigative reporter for the Des Moines Register to join Nixon, Mollenhoff's role at the White House was described as that of inspector general for the administration. He prefers the title "presidential ombudsman" and says simply that it is his job to protect the President's interest in all matters that come to his attention.

It is not easy to describe Mollenhoff's role in any given case, because, while he sees reporters frequently he seldom speaks for the record.

Behind his desk there is a neatly lettered sign that says "Background Only" in large letters. It adds that reporters who want quotes should see Herbert Klein, the President's communications assistant.

But Mollenhoff has been quoted as saying that he is answerable only to the President himself, and in his first eight months, "there's not an agency or department I haven't looked into."

But Mollenhoff touched one of the administration's most sensitive nerves when he showed sympathy with the young liberal intellectuals of the Ripon Society and their complaints.

And apparently his authority has changed now. The State Department has been put off limits.

Undersecretary of State Elliot L. Richardson had been a long supporter of the Ripon Society, when members of that Republican group expressed concern over American policy toward Biafra.

It was Richardson who made it possible for them to interview diplomats in the African section of the State Department and to see the cable traffic to Lagos.

Despite this cooperation, two leading members of the organization, President Josiah Lee Auspitz and member Christopher Beal, remained unconvinced and published a lengthy report criticizing the department—and specifically Richardson—for "insubordination" in neglecting to carry out Nixon's attempt to modify Nigerian policy.

The report received almost no major attention in the press despite its sensitive nature and the aggressive advertising of some Ripon members. When this failed to put the heat on the State Department, Beal and Auspitz went to Mollenhoff.

He reportedly considered their complaints worth checking in the light of past complaints against the department bureaucracy, usually made by conservative Republicans, which amounted to the same charge of sabotage of presidential wishes.

State Department officials have maintained that all of this is a tempest in a teapot; that the President has never shown the flaming concern for Biafra that the Ripon Society suggests, and that he has not expressed any dissatisfaction with the State Department.

Whether this is the case or not, Kissinger moved quickly to keep relations with the the department from deteriorating, especially his own personal relations with Richardson, which have been close.

Not everybody in the White House agreed with the interpretation that Mollenhoff has been called off, but he was maintaining his posture of official silence.

MIZE HAILS ACTION ON INCREASE IN GI EDUCATIONAL BENEFITS

(Mr. MIZE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. MIZE. Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to note that the Senate this week cleared the conference report on the Veterans' Education and Training Amendments Act of 1970 for signature by the President.

Under this important legislation, the veterans' educational assistance allowance rate will be increased by 34.6 percent. Considering the rapidly increasing costs of higher and vocational education, these increases have been overdue.

Many Vietnam veterans have made an effort to continue their educations, often with heavy family responsibilities. This legislation will serve to promote their continued enrollment in college and it will encourage other Vietnam veterans to return to school.

Mr. Speaker, the Kansas 69th Brigade, and other fine Kansas Reserve and Guard units were called by President Johnson to serve in Vietnam. These men, many of whom are combat veterans of Korea and World War II, distinguished themselves again in some of the most treacherous combat our fighting men have ever undergone.

These new benefits that the Congress has approved cannot in full measure repay all the Nation owes them—but it can serve as an expression of our compassion for their difficulties and our understanding of their desire to continue their schooling after military interruption.

Mr. Speaker, our Nation owes these veterans a deep debt of gratitude for their selfless service in an unpopular and little-understood war. Vietnam has been called a "second-class war in a second-class country."

One thing is for sure—our Vietnam veterans deserve more than second-class educational benefits. This legislation is a move in the right direction.

URBAN GROWTH POLICY

(Mr. ASHLEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today legislation calling for a national urban growth policy and the building of new communities and the improvement of the quality of existing communities. I am joined in this legislation by the distinguished chairman of the House Banking and Currency Committee (Mr. PATMAN), the chairman of the Housing Subcommittee (Mr. BARRETT), the majority whip of the House (Mr. BOGGS), the chairman of the Democratic caucus (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI), and many of my colleagues on the Banking and Currency Committee.

Identical legislation is being introduced in the Senate today by the distinguished chairman of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, the Honorable JOHN SPARKMAN.

Mr. Speaker, we have had a half century of rapid urbanization in the United States during which the Federal Government has taken a "watch-topsy-grow" attitude. The time has come to start shaping events in our urban society rather than have events shape us. Demands for a decent living environment can only be satisfied if we have a national policy to use all our resources for rational urban development—both physical and socioeconomic.

There are a multitude of Federal programs and policies, such as the Federal interstate highway program, which shape our urban destiny and yet they are carried on in a mindless fashion with little or no consideration of how they will affect or destroy any rational urban objectives.

Extensive hearings by the Subcommittee on Urban Growth have carefully charted population growth which indicates an increase in population of 100 million during the next 30 years. These additional people must be housed and the quality of housing of many of our existing people must be improved. Continued reliance on urban sprawl is only going to aggravate the abrasive quality of urban life.

This bill creates a three-member Council on Urban Growth in the Executive Office of the President. With the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development as member ex officio, this group would be responsible for formulating national policies to guide States, counties, metropolitan areas, and cities and towns toward rational growth and development.

The bill provides assistance, both technical and financial, for a comprehensive approach to urban overgrowth. It contains major provisions for the development of new communities, inner city areas and plans for State and regional growth and stabilization.

The bill substantially expands HUD's title IV new community program which only guarantees obligations sold by developers to finance land development. Under the new legislation, public bodies would be eligible for grants for feasibility studies and planning for new community development. Any eligible developer, private or public, could receive loans for the costs of land acquisition and the construction of public facilities and commercial and industrial centers. The loans have the advantage of substantial delay before repayment is due to begin.

The legislation creates a Community Development Corporation to run this new community development program. The Corporation would have a five-member Board of Directors, one of whom is a member of the Executive Council. The Corporation's responsibilities include providing grant and loan assistance and assuming title IV guaranteeing power from the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, planning community growth and development programs, carrying out large-scale new community demonstration projects on federally owned land and land acquisition. All these powers and duties would be vested in the Corporation's Board.

The provisions for inner-city development are aimed at acquiring currently occupied land for rebuilding for residential use to help solve the housing shortage in our cities. The legislation amends title I of the Housing Act of 1949. It differs from conventional urban renewal in that the land does not have to be blighted to qualify it for use under this title. Instead, local public agencies would be given assistance for rebuilding projects on land currently occupied by functionally obsolete or uneconomic uses, endangered by natural hazards or inadequately developed. Infrequently used rail yards, air rights over streets, flood lands, and other unused or underused land could be acquired for the development of residential housing and public facilities.

The bill also provides States and regional bodies with grants to assist in financing population growth and urban development programs and technical assistance in land-use planning and development. Grants under the bill's fourth title may also be used to purchase open or predominantly open land surrounding urban areas for purposes of new community development, recreation, or generally to conserve and protect the environment.

I understand that hearings on this and other related legislation will begin in mid-April. I hope that we may see enactment of this legislation this year.

Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD at this point a brief summary of the bill and the bill itself:

SUMMARY OF H.R. 16647—THE URBAN GROWTH AND NEW COMMUNITIES DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1970

The objectives of this bill are to provide for the development of a national urbanization policy and to encourage and support more rational, orderly, efficient, and economic growth and development of our States, metropolitan areas, cities, and towns with emphasis upon the development of new communities and upon inner city development. In order to achieve the objectives, the act establishes a Council on Urban Growth to develop a national urbanization policy, requires the submission to Congress and to the President of a biennial Report on Urban Growth, creates a Community Development Corporation within the Department of Housing and Urban Development to promote and sponsor new community and more orderly urban development, provides for inner city development to augment the supply of housing, and encourages State and regional planning for growth and stabilization.

Title I of the act recognizes the need for a national urbanization policy and specifically outlines the purposes of this policy. A Council on Urban Growth is created within the Executive Office of the President to prepare a biennial Report on Urban Growth, to collect, analyze, and evaluate relevant information, to assess the effects of Federal programs on urban growth, and to assess other public and private efforts to create rational urban growth. The report shall include significant problems encountered as a result of urban growth trends and developments, a review of existing programs and efforts, and recommendations for future programs and policies.

Title II, the Development of New Communities, encourages public and private bodies to undertake community growth and development programs, including the development of new communities, satellite communities, accelerated growth centers, new towns-in-town, and other large scale urban development. The Community Development Corporation is established and authorized to extend financial assistance through loans to eligible developers for feasibility studies, planning, land acquisition and development, construction of essential public works and facilities, and necessary commercial and industrial areas. The Corporation may also provide public service grants for the staffing of essential public facilities and services. Any development undertaken under this title must be economically feasible and must contribute to the orderly growth and development of the area. The developer must provide a sound internal development plan which is consistent with any comprehensive planning in the area and which has received all necessary governmental approvals. The new community guarantee program authorized by title IV of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968 is transferred to the Corporation. The Community Development Corporation, as a government corporation within the Department of Housing and Urban Development, is authorized to establish a Community Development Fund, carry out demonstration programs and advise on the compatibility of any major Federal installation with the provisions of this act.

Title III provides for inner city development to augment the inventory of housing and essential public services through more rational use of urban land and space. Title I of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended to permit the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development to make financial assistance available to local public agencies for rebuilding projects on land which is currently occupied by functionally obsolete or uneconomic uses or which is currently unusable because of natural hazards or inadequate development, though not necessarily "blighted". Grants under this title shall be available for feasibility studies, planning and developing the project, and the acquisition and preparation of land and space.

Title IV, Assistance Planning for State and Regional Growth and Stabilization, amends section 701 of the Housing Act of 1954 to provide grants to States, regional bodies, State boundary commissions and municipal incorporation control agencies to assist in financing the cost of conducting population growth and urban development planning programs. In addition this title provides technical assistance to State and regional agencies engaged in land-use planning and authorizes grants to enable such agencies to purchase open land surrounding urban and metropolitan areas to insure proper growth and development.

Title V of this act includes general provisions relating to relocation requirements and payments, housing priorities for programs assisted, requirements for the utilization of new and improved construction methods and techniques, and advance consent to interstate compacts for mutual assistance in carrying out the objectives of the Act.

A bill to provide for the development of a national urban growth policy, and to encourage and support the rational, orderly, efficient, and economic growth and development of our States, metropolitan areas, cities, counties, and towns, with emphasis upon the development of new communities and upon inner city development

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Urban Growth and New Community Development Act of 1970".

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) It is the policy of the Congress and the purpose of this Act to provide for the development of a national urban growth policy and to encourage the rational, orderly, efficient, and economic growth, development, and redevelopment of our States, metropolitan areas, cities, counties, and towns in predominantly rural areas which demonstrate a special potential for accelerated growth; and to encourage and support development which will assure our communities of adequate tax bases, community services, job opportunities, and well-balanced neighborhoods in socially, economically, and physically attractive living environments.

TITLE I—DEVELOPMENT OF A NATIONAL URBAN GROWTH POLICY

FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 101. (a) The Congress finds that the rapid growth of urban population and expanding urban development in the United States, together with a decline in farm population, slower growth in rural areas, and migration to the cities, has created an imbalance between the Nation's needs and resources, and that the economic and social development of the Nation and the achievement of satisfactory living standards depend upon the sound, orderly, and more balanced development of all areas of the Nation.

(b) The Congress further finds that Federal programs affect the location of population, economic growth, and the character of urban development; that such programs frequently conflict and result in undesirable and costly patterns of urban development; and that existing and future programs must be interrelated and coordinated within a system of planned development and established priorities consistent with a national urban growth policy.

(c) To promote the general welfare and to properly apply the resources of the Federal Government to strengthen the economic and social health of all areas of the Nation, the Congress declares that the Federal Government, consistent with the responsibilities of State and local government and the private sector, must assume responsibility to develop a national urban growth policy, which shall incorporate social, economic, and other appropriate factors. Such policy shall serve as a guide in making specific decisions at the national level which affect the pattern of urban growth and shall provide a framework for development of interstate, State, and local growth and stabilization policy.

(d) The Congress further declares that the national urban growth policy should—

(1) favor patterns of urbanization and economic development and stabilization which offer a range of alternative locations and encourage the wise and balanced use of physical and human resources in metropolitan and regional areas as well as in urban areas (with full consideration being given to the development of "accelerated growth centers" within the meaning part A of title II);

(2) foster the continued economic strength of all parts of the United States, including central cities, suburbs, smaller communities, local neighborhoods, and rural areas;

(3) reverse trends of migration and natural growth which reinforce disparities among States, regions, and cities;

(4) treat comprehensively the problems of poverty and employment (including the erosion of tax bases, and the need for better community services and job opportunities which are associated with urbanization and rural decline;

(5) develop means to reverse present trends which foster racial conflict;

(6) define the role of the Federal Government in revitalizing existing communities and encouraging planned, large-scale urban and new community development;

(7) assist general governmental institutions in achieving balanced urban growth and stabilization; and

(8) facilitate increased coordination in the administration of Federal programs so as to encourage desirable patterns of urban growth and stabilization.

CREATION OF COUNCIL ON URBAN GROWTH

SEC. 102. There is created in the Executive Office of the President a Council on Urban Growth (hereinafter in this title referred to as the "Council"). The President shall designate one of the appointed members of the Council to serve as Chairman. Each appointed member shall be a person who, as a result of his training, experience, and attainments, is exceptionally well qualified to analyze and interpret urban and environmental trends and information of all kinds; to appraise programs and activities of the Federal Government in the light of the policy set forth in sections 2 and 101; to be conscious of and responsive to the scientific, economic, social, esthetic, and cultural needs and interests of the Nation; and to formulate and recommend national policies to carry out the policy set forth in sections 2 and 101.

SEC. 222. (a) The Corporation shall have a Board of Directors (hereinafter referred to as the "Board") which shall consist of five members, one of whom shall be a member of the Council on Urban Growth as designated by the President and the other four of whom shall be appointed by the President of the United States by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The term of office of each member of the Board shall be four years; except that of the members first appointed one shall be appointed for a term of four years, one for a term of three years, one for a term of two years, and two for terms of one year.

(b) Members of the Board shall serve at the pleasure of the President and until their successors have been appointed and have qualified, and shall receive compensation at the rate provided for positions at level IV of the Executive Schedule Pay Rates (5 U.S.C. 5315) (except that the member who is designated from the Council on Urban Growth shall receive no additional compensation for his service on the Board).

(c) The President shall designate one of the members of the Board to serve as its chairman.

(d) The Board shall meet at the call of its chairman, who shall require it to meet not less often than monthly.

MANAGEMENT OF CORPORATION

SEC. 223. The management and administration of the Corporation shall be vested in the chairman of the Board, who shall act under the Board's general direction.

FUNCTIONS OF CORPORATION

SEC. 224. (a) It shall be the function of the Corporation—

(1)(A) to provide assistance (including grants under section 203 and loans under section 204) to aid in financing community growth and development programs as provided by part A and this part, and part (B) to provide assistance in the form of guarantees to aid in financing new community development as provided in part B;

(2) when requested to do so on its behalf by an eligible developer which is a public entity described in section 206, to plan, initiate, and carry out community growth and development programs (subject to the provisions of this Act which are applicable to the conduct of such programs by State or local agencies to the extent such provisions can be applied), utilizing its own personnel and facilities or contracting with qualified public or private persons or entities for the purpose;

(3) upon specific authorization by the President and under applicable Federal law respecting the use of federally owned lands, to carry out large-scale projects demonstrating the development of new communities, which shall be designed to contribute to the achievement of the purposes of this title and serve as models for similar developments (with or without assistance under part A or part B) which could feasibly be carried out by other public and private developers;

(4) to take such actions as may be calculated to assist in developing a high level of Federal capability in the field of regional and community planning and development;

(5) to carry on other research, training, and demonstrations in the field of regional and community planning and development; and

(6) to make available such information, provide such other assistance, and take such other actions as may be necessary or appropriate to carry out the purposes of this title or as may be otherwise provided for by law.

(b) Whenever any Federal department, agency, or instrumentality proposes to establish, develop, or construct (or provide assistance for the establishment, development, or construction of) any major installation (as determined in accordance with regulations of the Board), the head of such department, agency, or instrumentality shall notify the Corporation (without the necessity of any request therefor) of its intent to establish, develop, or construct such installation (or provide such assistance), and shall furnish to the Corporation such information as the Corporation may request concerning the proposed installation. If the Corporation determines that the proposed installation would be wholly or partly inconsistent with the purposes of this title, it shall so advise the head of the department, agency, or instrumentality involved and shall provide him and the President with such recommendations with respect thereto as it deems appropriate. The head of such department, agency, or instrumentality shall thereupon consult fully with the Corporation concerning the proposed installation, and shall take such action to conform with the Corporation's recommendations as he deems appropriate and feasible, before proceeding with the establishment, development, or construction of the installation or the provision of such assistance.

FINANCING OF CORPORATION'S ACTIVITIES

SEC. 225. (a)(1) To carry out its functions under this title, the Corporation is authorized and directed to establish in the Treasury of the United States a revolving fund to be known as the Community Development Fund, which shall be available without fiscal year limitation for making loans under this title.

(2) The Community Development Fund shall be credited with—

(A) the proceeds from the sale of obligations under subsection (b) of this section,

(B) the proceeds from repayments of loans provided under part A, and

(C) any other receipts from operations under this title, including annual payments made pursuant to subsection (c)(1) of this section.

(3) No part of the amounts in the Community Development Fund shall be used for the payment of any administrative expenses.

(4) Notwithstanding the preceding provisions of this subsection, the payment of liabilities incurred by the Corporation as a result of guarantees made under title IV of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968 shall be made only from the guarantee fund established pursuant to section 407 of such Act and in accordance with the terms of such title; and the Community Development Fund established pursuant to this subsection shall not be available for the provision of assistance in the form of guarantees under such title or credited with any receipts from operations under such title.

(5) An annual business-type budget for the Community Development Fund shall be prepared, transmitted to the Congress, considered, and enacted in the manner prescribed by law (sections 102, 103, and 104 of the Government Corporation Control Act (31 U.S.C. 847–849)) for wholly owned Government corporations.

(b) In order to obtain funds for its activities under part A (except grants under section 204(d)), the Corporation—

(1) is authorized, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to issue and have outstanding obligations having such maturities and bearing such rate or rates of interest as may be determined by the Corporation. Such obligations may be redeemable at the option of the Corporation before maturity in such manner as may be stipulated therein. The aggregate amount of obligations of the Corporation outstanding at any one time shall not exceed $, which amount shall be increased by on July 1, 1971, and by $ on July 1 of each of the three succeeding years. The Corporation is authorized to purchase in the open market any of its outstanding obligations issued under this paragraph; and

(2) is authorized to issue to the Secretary of the Treasury such obligations, having such maturities and (subject to the succeeding provisions of this subsection) bearing such rate or rates of interest, as the Corporation may determine to be necessary. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to purchase any obligations issued under the preceding sentence, and for such purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public debt transaction the proceeds of the sale of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as now or hereafter in force; and the purposes for which securities may be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act as now or hereafter in force are extended to include such purchases. Each purchase of obligations by the Secretary of the Treasury under this subsection shall be upon such terms and conditions as to yield a return at a rate not less than a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average yield on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States of comparable maturities. The Secretary of the Treasury may sell, upon such terms and conditions and at such price or prices as he shall determine, any of the obligations acquired by him under this paragraph. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of such obligations under this paragraph shall be treated as public debt transactions of the United States.

The full faith and credit of the United States is pledged to the payment of both the principal and interest of all obligations issued by the Corporation under paragraph (1) or (2) of this subsection.

(c) (1) With respect to such amounts of loans made by the Corporation under section 204 as may be specified in appropriation Acts, the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development is authorized to make, and to contract to make, annual payments to the Corporation in such amounts as are necessary to equal the amount by which the dollar amount of interest paid by the Corporation on account of its obligations issued under subsection (b) exceeds the dollar amount of interest received by the Corporation on account of loans made by it pursuant to such section 204.

(2) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development such sums as may be necessary to make the annual payments required by contracts entered into by him pursuant to paragraph (1).

(c) The Corporation, including its franchise, capital, reserves, surplus, mortgages or other security holdings, and income shall be exempt from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, by any territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority; except that any real property of the Corporation shall be subject to State, territorial, county, municipal, or local taxation to the some extent according to its value as other real property is taxed.

(d) The Board shall have power to select and appoint or employ such officers, attorneys, employees, and agents of the Corporation, to vest them with such powers and duties, and to fix and to cause the Corporation to pay such compensation to them for their services, as it may determine, subject to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service and the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates. (e) The Federal Reserve banks are authorized and directed to act as depositaries, custodians, and fiscal agents for the Corporation, for its own account or as fiduciary, and such banks shall be reimbursed for such services in such manner as may be agreed upon; and the Corporation may itself act in such capacities, for its own account or as fiduciary, and for the account of others.

(f) Moneys of the Corporation not currently needed for the purpose of this title shall be kept in cash on hand or on deposit, or invested in obligations of the United States or guaranteed thereby, or in obligations, participations, or other instruments which are lawful investments for fiduciary, trust, or public funds.

AUDIT OF FINANCIAL TRANSACTIONS

SEC. 227. (a) The financial transactions of the Corporation shall be audited by the General Accounting Office in accordance with the principles and procedures applicable to commercial corporate transactions and under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Comptroller General of the United States. The audit shall be conducted at the place or places where the accounts are normally kept. The representatives of the General Accounting Office shall have access to all books, accounts, financial records, reports, files, and other papers, things, or property belonging to or in use by the Corporation and necessary to facilitate the audit, and they shall be afforded full facilities for verifying transactions with the balances or securities held by depositaries, fiscal agents, and custodians.

(b) The expenses of any audit performed under this section shall be borne out of appropriations to the General Accounting Office, and appropriations in such sums as may be necessary for this purpose are authorized. The Corporation shall reimburse the General Accounting Office for the full cost of such audit as billed therefor by the Comptroller General, and the General Accounting Office shall deposit the sums so reimbursed into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

(c) A report of each such audit for a fiscal year shall be made by the Comptroller General to the President and to the Congress not later than six months following the close of such fiscal year.

ANNUAL REPORT

SEC. 228. The Corporation shall, as soon as practicable after the close of each fiscal year, transmit to the President and the Congress a report of its operations and activities.

TITLE III—INNER CITY DEVELOPMENT

PURPOSE

SEC. 301. It is the purpose of this title to provide our cities, which desperately need to augment their inventories of housing (particularly housing for low and moderate income families) and essential public facilities but have virtually no vacant land upon which to build, with a program which will make possible the more rational use of urban land and space that is currently occupied by industrial or commercial uses which though not "blighted" are functionally obsolete or uneconomic, or of land and space that is not usable in its present state because of natural hazards or inadequate developments, so that in appropriate cases major rebuilding projects (including new towns in town) may be undertaken without major clearance activities and with minimal displacement.

"PART C—INNER CITY DEVELOPMENT PROJECTS

SEC. 302. Title I of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new part:

"PART C—INNER CITY DEVELOPMENT PROJECTS

"PURPOSE AND AUTHORITY

"SEC. 141. (a) For the purpose of facilitating needed development in urban areas through the more effective use of land and space that is currently occupied by functionally obsolete or uneconomic uses or is not usable in its present state because of natural hazard or inadequate development, the Secretary is authorized to make financial assistance available under this title to local public agencies for inner city rebuilding projects which are approved by him pursuant to this part.

"(b) An inner city rebuilding project shall consist of urban renewal project undertakings and activities which are planned and designed to carry out the purpose of this part by—

"(1) acquiring for alternative uses—

"(A) infrequently used rail yards and rail storage facilities, and excessive or vacated railroad rights-of-way;

"(B) air rights sites over streets, expressways, railroads, waterways, and similar locations;

"(C) strips and plots of land which are vacant or are occupied by functionally obsolete nonresidential buildings or used for low-utility purposes, or are used for purposes which are plainly inappropriate in the light of modern community needs and desirable standards of good land use;

"(D) land which is covered by shallow water or is subject to periodic flooding, or which consists of unused or underused slips or dock areas or other waterfront property;

"(E) park and open space land which would be more appropriately devoted to uses consistent with the purpose of this part and will be replaced (by trade or otherwise) by equal or greater amounts of park or open space land (or land to be cleared for park or open space purposes) in other locations; or

"(F) other land or space within the city which is vacant, unused, underused, or inappropriately used and the acquisition of which would contribute significantly to the achievement of the purpose of this part; and

"(2) preparing the land or space so acquired for development (with particular emphasis on housing for low and moderate income families), including preparation for the provision of schools, hospitals, parks, and other essential public facilities and, in appropriate cases, for the development of new towns-in-town (within the meaning of that term as used in Part A of title III of the Urban Growth and New Community Development Act of 1970).

"(c) No financial assistance for an inner city rebuilding project shall be approved by the Secretary unless—

"(1) the governing body of the locality has, by resolution or ordinance, approved the proposed project and authorized the filing of the application for assistance, and

"(2) the Secretary has concluded that—

"(A) there exists the necessary capacity to carry out the undertakings and activities proposed in connection with the project;

"(B) the need for the housing or other facilities to be provided has been established;

"(C) the proposed use of the land or space involved is appropriate and consistent with the planning objectives of the community and provides a positive benefit to the adjacent neighborhoods; and

"(D) the proposed housing and other facilities cannot be provided expeditiously under traditional renewal processes.

"FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

"SEC. 142. (a) Upon the submission of a proposed inner city rebuilding project to the Secretary, he may approve the undertakings and activities proposed in connection with or as part of such project to the extent that he finds they are or will be consistent with the provisions of this title and the purpose of this part; and the cost of any undertakings and activities so approved shall be financed in accordance with the loan, capital grant, and project cost provisions of part A except as specifically hereafter provided in this section.

"(b) Assistance under this title with respect to an inner city rebuilding project shall be available only to finance the costs of—

"(1) feasibility studies to determine the desirability and practicability of the project, including—

"(A) in the case of land described in section 141(b)(1)(D), studies to determine the types of reclamation activities needed and improvements required to make the land usable, and to determine the potential for such improvements and the ecological consequences which would result therefrom;

"(B) in the case of land described in section 141(b)(1)(E), activities designed to test the feasibility of proposed land trades and to develop appropriate legal safeguards to guarantee full and adequate replacement; and

"(C) in any case where the land involved is to be developed under the project for a new town-in-town, studies to explore and test the feasibility of the necessary site assembly and to assure that there can be made available an area of sufficient size to give reasonable potential for large-scale development with a substantial increase in the amount of low and moderate income housing in the community;

"(2) planning and developing the project after feasibility has been determined; and

"(3) acquiring the land or space necessary to carry out the project and preparing such land or space for the development provided for under the project as approved.

"(c)(1) Assistance under this part with respect to an inner city rebuilding project (which, except to the extent that the project involved is part of a project or program approved under part A or part B, shall be separate and distinct from other assistance under this title in all respects including funding) shall be in the form of a grant in an amount determined in the same manner, under the same formulas, and with the inclusion and exclusion of the same items as is provided by sections 103(a) and 110 (d), (e), and (f), and by any other relevant provisions of part A, with respect to assistance in the form of capital grants under that part.

"(2) The Secretary may contract to make grants under this title for inner city rebuilding projects as provided in this part in an amount not to exceed $———— in any fiscal year, and there are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to provide therefor. The Secretary may, notwithstanding the provisions of section 3648 of the Revised Statutes, make advance or progress payments on account of any grant contracted to be made pursuant to this section. The full faith and credit of the United States is pledged to the payment of all such grants contracted for.

"(3) For purposes of paragraph (1), the term 'cost of the undertakings and activities involved' means, insofar as the cost of acquiring and preparing the land or space (as described in subsection (b)(3) is concerned, the difference between—

"(A) the cost of acquiring and preparing such land or space (including the cost of track removal and track realignment in the case of land described in section 141(b)(1)(A) and the cost of eliminating flood and drainage problems in the case of land described in section 141(b)(1)(D)), and

"(B) the re-use value of the land or space as proposed under the project.

In the case of air right sites as described in section 141(b)(1)(B), such term includes the cost of the design and construction of foundations, platforms, and site access facilities.

"REGULATIONS

"SEC. 143. The Secretary shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary or appropriate to carry out this part, including such special regulations as may be required to modify the relevant provisions of part A in order to make them effectively applicable under this part in a manner calculated to achieve its purpose."

TITLE IV—ASSISTANCE TO STATES AND REGIONAL BODIES FOR PLANNING FOR STATE AND REGIONAL GROWTH AND STABILIZATION

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 701 URBAN PLANNING PROGRAM

SEC. 401. (a) In order to provide special assistance for programs of planning and development designed to assure rational and controlled State and regional growth and stabilization, section 701 of the Housing Act of 1954 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(j)(1) The Secretary is authorized to make grants to States and appropriate regional bodies (including organizations of representative public officials described in subsection (g), State boundary commissions, and municipal incorporation control agencies) to assist in financing the cost of developing and conducting population growth and urban development planning programs.

"(2) Programs assisted under this subsection shall be designed to determine, on the basis of analyses of available basic resources (including water, air, land, and power) and the need to conserve such resources and to maintain or recapture a quality environment, where and how much growth and development ought to take place in the State or region involved and the standards, which ought to be established to control and stabilize such growth or development. Each such program shall include recommendations for improved governmental efficiency through intergovernmental arrangements, functional consolidations, general government consolidations, and establishment of service districts under the control of the general governments involved; and shall be designed to undertake or assist—

"(A) studies of the projected growth, composition, and movement of population in the State or region involved, and the public facilities (including but not limited to health, education, water, and power) which would be necessary to accommodate such population efficiently and without adverse effect on the environment;

"(B) the development of criteria for the size, composition, location, and design of new communities to be established and existing communities to be substantially expanded and enlarged in order to accommodate the population projected, and criteria for the environmental factors (including public facilities and other community facilities) necessary to achieve desirable communities;

"(C) the preparation of an inventory of the sites available and most suitable for development;

"(D) the study, development, and implementation of methods for assuring the availability of land and its proper development; and

"(E) the promotion by State and regional agencies of rational and constructive land use and development, and the conduct by such agencies of effective studies and planning to reduce governmental complexity, streamline governmental machinery, and avoid duplication of public functions in planning and development.

"(3) The amount of any grant made under the authority of this subsection shall not exceed 90 per centum of the estimated cost of carrying out the program assisted.

"(4) Of the amount appropriated pursuant to paragraph (5) to carry out this subsection for any fiscal year—

"(A) the sum of $———— shall first be allocated to each State for the purpose of this subsection;

"(B) there shall then be reserved to the Secretary such sums as he may require for the administration of this subsection, together with an amount equal to 10 per centum of the amount so appropriated for research, technical assistance, publications, and demonstration projects to be conducted by the Secretary to advance the purposes of this subsection; and

"(C) the remainder shall be allocated among the States for the purposes of this subsection, with each State receiving an amount which bears the same ratio to such remainder as the population of such State bears to the population of all the States.

"(5) There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out this subsection such sums as may be necessary, not exceeding $——— prior to July 1, 1971. Amounts so appropriated shall remain available until expended."

(b) The caption for such section 701 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: ", AND ASSISTANCE FOR STATE AND REGIONAL GROWTH AND STABILIZATION PLANNING".

SPECIAL ASSISTANCE FOR LAND ACQUISITION TO CONTROL GROWTH

SEC. 402. (a) In addition to his function of providing financial assistance under section 701(j) of the Housing Act of 1954 (as added by section 401 of this Act), the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary") may—

(1) provide technical assistance to State and regional agencies engaged in programs of land-use planning and development which might qualify for assistance under this title, and undertake (either directly or by contract) such studies and evaluation of State, regional, and related local programs as he determines to be desirable; and

(2) make grants to State agencies and regional bodies which are conducting State or regional programs of land-use planning and development approved for purposes of this section, to enable them to purchase such interests in strips or wedges of open or predominantly open land surrounding urban or metropolitan areas as may be necessary to insure proper and constructive community growth and development, and achieve the objectives of a State or regional growth and stabilization program, by preventing uncontrolled encroachment upon such land by commercial, industrial, or residential construction, with such grants being limited to 75 per centum of the purchase price of the land and being subject to such other terms and conditions as the Secretary may consider reasonable and appropriate.

Land acquired by a State or regional agency with assistance under paragraph (2) may be held out of development to protect and develop new communities, to provide scenic easements and flood plains, to preserve historic places, to be used for recreation, or generally to conserve and protect the environment; and the Secretary shall establish by regulation such terms and conditions applicable thereto as he deems necessary or appropriate, including provisions governing the minimum periods of time the land is to be devoted to particular uses, the permissible uses of such land upon resale, and the repayment of grants under such subparagraph, and including provision for such equitable arrangements as may be desirable with respect to the sharing of an increase in value of such land over its initial purchase price upon its resale.

(b) There is authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year not to exceed $———— to carry out this section.

REGULATIONS AND DEFINITIONS

SEC. 403. (a) The Secretary shall prescribe such regulations and make such arrangements as may be necessary or appropriate to insure that the special assistance provided under section 402 and section 701(j) of the Housing Act of 1954 will be effectively coordinated, without duplication, in a manner calculated to promote the objectives of this title.

(b) As used in this title and section 701(j) of the Housing Act of 1954, the term "State" means any of the fifty States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands; and the term "region" means any area within the United States which includes all or a part of one or more States.

TITLE V—GENERAL PROVISIONS

RELOCATION REQUIREMENTS AND PAYMENTS

SEC. 501. (a) Any contract or other arrangement for assistance under this Act with respect to a program or project shall include a plan for the relocation of individuals, families, business concerns, and nonprofit organizations displaced or to be displaced in the carrying out of such program or project. The provisions and procedures included in any such relocation plan shall meet relocation standards equivalent to those described under section 105(c) of the Housing Act of 1949 with respect to urban renewal projects assisted under title I of that Act, and the relocation activities under the plan shall to the maximum extent feasible be coordinated with the activities assisted under this Act so as to assure that the available supply of housing in the area involved will be maintained or improved.

(b)(1) To the extent not otherwise authorized under any Federal law, financial assistance under any provision of this Act shall include grants to cover the full cost of relocation payments.

(2) As used in paragraph (1), the term "relocation payments" means payments to a displaced individual, family, business concern, or nonprofit organization which are made on such terms and conditions and subject to such limitations (to the extent applicable, but not including the date of displacement) as are provided for relocation payments, at the time such payments are approved, by section 114 (b), (c), (d), and (e) of the Housing Act of 1949 with respect to projects assisted under title I thereof.

PRIORITIES IN HOUSING PRODUCED UNDER PROGRAMS ASSISTED

SEC. 502. Under regulations which shall be prescribed jointly by the Community Development Corporation and the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, a priority to occupy housing produced under or resulting from any program or project carried out or assisted under this Act shall be given to individuals and families who have been displaced from their homes by urban renewal, highway construction, or any other activities carried out by a governmental agency or with assistance under a Federal program.

UTILIZATION OF NEW AND IMPROVED CONSTRUCTION METHODS AND TECHNIQUES

SEC. 503. No assistance shall be provided under any provision of this Act with respect to any program or project unless the Community Development Corporation or the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development (as may be appropriate) finds that there are in effect within the area where such program or project is located modern building and housing codes which permit the utilization of factory-built housing, industrialized building techniques, and other improved housing construction methods, technology, techniques, and materials which have been tested and approved by institutions qualified to do so and found acceptable by the Secretary for purposes of programs within his jurisdiction.

INTERSTATE COMPACTS

SEC. 504. The consent of the Congress is hereby given to any two or more States to enter into agreements or contracts, not in conflict with any law of the United States, for cooperative efforts and mutual assistance in carrying out or implementing any of the purposes of objectives of this Act, and to establish such agencies, joint or otherwise, as they may deem desirable for making effective such agreements and compacts.

AMERICANS OF ITALIAN DESCENT—THE SILENT MAJORITY IS AWAKENING

(Mr. RARICK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. RARICK. Mr. Speaker, last night I had the privilege of addressing the Americans of Italian descent at the annual installation of officers banquet of the Middlesex County chapter at North Brunswick, N.J.

On the same program was a distinguished leader of the Democratic Party, its recent candidate for mayor of New York City, and an outstanding spokesman for the Americans of Italian descent in the United States, the Honorable Mario A. Procaccino, a foreign-born American who has contributed to our American way of life by service on the faculties of City College of New York and Fordham University; as a judge; as comptroller of the city of New York, and presently as academic president of Verrazano College.

Because I believe that Judge Procaccino's address best demonstrates the real American sentiments and loyalties of the Americans of Italian descent, I insert his remarks in the RECORD for all of our colleagues to read:

REMARKS OF JUDGE MARIO A. PROCACCINO

Mr. Chairman, Distinguished Guests, Fellow Italo-Americans:

First of all, let me thank you Mr. Chairman, for the kind words you said about me. More importantly, I wish to express my thanks and gratitude to each and every one of you for this "outstanding Italo-American Award" and for your kind invitation to be here this evening.

I feel very flattered because within a space of a few weeks, I have been honored by the Italian government as a Commander in the Order of Merit, I have been designated as "Mr. New York" by the citizens of Brooklyn, and now the "outstanding Italo-American" award by this outstanding group of citizens of New Jersey.

I enjoy being here, not only because I feel that I am among friends, but because it permits me to pay tribute to the officers and members of your organization, and to wish that you enjoy continued success. I believe that this gathering is proof of the support and confidence which the members and friends of the association have in its leadership, in its objectives, in its work and its accomplishments.

I have great respect for your organization, realizing that it is made up of Americans of Italian origin, who originally banded together to combat discrimination. I know that yours is a nonpolitical association, whose members are proud of their Italian heritage and equally proud to be Americans. Accordingly, may I extend my sincere congratulations for the work you are doing in the community.

There can be little question but that we are facing one of the most critical periods in our country's history. One cannot read a newspaper or watch a television newscast without becoming intensely aware of the fact that disrespect for the law and the rights of others is daily becoming more and more a way of life.

As a New Yorker, I am ashamed to admit that anarchy is abroad in the streets of the greatest city in the world, terrorists disrupt commerce and industry at the cost of a phone call, violent revolution is preached openly on our campuses, the demolition squads of the radical-left have created panic among the people, and not one of the self-described "Liberals" who seek Democratic nomination for high office in the New York State 1970 elections has uttered a word of condemnation.

I am concerned and alarmed by this silence on the part of men who hold themselves forth as being worthy of the public trust, as civic leaders, and as protectors of the common good. I ask why this failure to speak out? Is it because they are so closely identified with and obligated to the radical-left that they dare not raise their voices? Do they espouse the radical-left philosophy of government? Are they cowed by physical fear, or are they afraid of alienating the votes of alienated youth?

Over recent years, selfish politicians and educators have encouraged the phony "cult of youth" syndrome to the point where bearded and disheveled tramps under the age of 25 are considered to have a license to engage in violence and offenses against the public interest.

I predict that, if this pseudo license is not revoked through the enforcement of existing laws, an alarmed and outraged public will demand and get the enactment of extremely repressive measures which will do violence to constitutional guarantees.

As the spokesman for progressive and moderate Democrats in New York, I demand that the contenders for the party nominations explain their sinister silence in the face of the blatant left-wing violence which threatens to destroy New York City, and that they make known their attitude and position with regard to the radical-left.

It is my firm judgment that our form of government, with its principles of democracy, is too precious to be permitted to sicken and decay. Our country will remain strong and healthy only as long as the rule of law is there to sustain it. Let us remember that laws are made to be respected, obeyed and enforced, and that if we violate the rights of others we are disregarding those laws.

This is why I feel so strongly about public officials conducting themselves in such a way as to make clear their dedication to duty, integrity, courage and leadership in preserving our laws and in protecting the lives and property of our citizens. For once we lose respect for our laws, we lose respect for our heritage, our ideals, our community, our nation, our families and ourselves.

By the work you are doing, by fighting discrimination, you set an example that, hopefully, will be emulated by others. By serving your community and your fellow citizen, you are teaching respect for the rights of all people and for the law—you are bringing credit to your heritage as Italo-Americans.

Speaking to you as an Italo-American who came here as a young immigrant, who understands what discrimination and struggle mean, let me leave you with these thoughts. To me, the United States of America is something to be loved with a passion that transcends patriotism, with a reverence that goes beyond worship, and with a dedication and devotion that go beyond duty. To me, this land must remain the symbol of opportunity, liberty and hospitality and security. It must remain an open door and open heart, more generous, more charitable and more forgiving than any other nation anywhere on earth.

This does not mean that I will ever forget the land of my birth. It was Nicholas Murray Butler, the late President of Columbia University, who once said, "The place of Italy is best shown by trying to subtract that place from world history. Take away her scientific accomplishments, her statesmanship, her leadership of the world for many years and what you have left? The world looks badly decapitated. You can subtract Italian culture from civilization only by destroying that civilization."

As Italo-Americans, never apologize to anyone for our background, our conduct, or our contributions as Americans. We must never assume the defensive—we must accentuate the positive.

Let all know that Italy is not just the mother country of many people, but historically, one of the great and noble parents of all civilization. The influence of things Italian upon the world is legendary.

The pages of history are too long, and far too many Italian names are recorded, for me to talk about them this evening. But let the world remember names like Michelangelo, Dante, Raffaello, de Vinci, Verrazzano, Columbus, Vespucci, Cellini, Petrarca, Galileo, Marconi, Fermi, Toscanini and thousands of others.

Let the world know of the countless thousands of Italo-Americans in every phase of human endeavor, in education, literature, and art, in law, health and medicine, in business and industry, in entertainment, sports and theatre, in science, politics and government—all of whom have contributed to the advancement of mankind and have brought honor to us all.

Let them know of the Italo-Americans who gave their blood for this country and let anyone name one, yes one, Italo-American, if they dare, who was ever convicted of treason against the United States of America.

Preaching this gospel of achievement should be our aim—this should be our creed.

In my twenty-five years of public service I have tried to bring credit and commendation to the Italo-Americans. I have always done the best I could to bring honor to all of us as a public servant, as a member of the faculties of City College and Fordham University for more than 21 years, as a Judge, as Comptroller of the City of New York, and now as the academic president of an institution of higher learning currently under formation, Verrazano College.

Since coming to this country at the age of nine, I believed in the American way of life, and believing in it, I have been particularly proud to play a role in a community in which both the fruits and obligations of democracy would be shared by all of its citizens on a basis of full equality without qualifications of any kind.

This is why I am deeply concerned about the discrimination being practiced by the limousine liberals, the committee for Democratic Demolition, and the political kingmakers, against Italo-Americans in the City and State of New York. Putting aside what politicians did to me on the way to City Hall, the fact remains there is—

Not a single city-wide elected official of Italian background in New York City.

Not a single Italo-American Borough President.

Not a single Italo-American District Attorney.

Not a single Italo-American member of the Board of Estimate.

Not a single state-wide elected official of Italian background.

What makes this more shocking is the fact that in New York State, Italo-Americans constitute the largest ethnic or national group—yes, over 37% of the population of the State of New York has an Italian background. Accordingly, let us serve notice on all—that we Italo-Americans possess the training, the know-how, the experience, the knowledge, the education, the integrity, the ability, and the dedication to serve our cities, our states, and our country in any and all fields of endeavor.

Yes, my friends, it is not enough to be proud of our ancestors but to make our descendants proud of us. It is not enough to let the world know who we are, but to let the world know what we do. It has been said that reputations are won, not made.

Everyone who is here tonight is to be congratulated for trying to make America proud of our Italian heritage. Many of us here tonight have had the same story of early struggle and early suffering, in order to win a place of honor and esteem in this wonderful land of opportunity.

The fact that many of you were born here, were married here, or your children were born here, makes you Americans of the first order. This is what gives our country its tremendous unity—a nation of all people from all parts of the world. With citizens like you, America will never die.

In conclusion, may I state that I am happy to have joined with you this evening and to have participated in paying tribute to your Italian background.

I again thank you for the award and for having invited me. May our country continue to prosper and lead the world in the family of nations.

IMPACT AID MONEYS

(Mr. BLACKBURN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, on the afternoon of March 23, 1970, I engaged in a colloquy with the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. WILLIAM D. FORD, regarding the President's expenditure of the impact aid moneys authorized and appropriated by the Congress during this session for the current fiscal year.

In order to clarify the RECORD, I am inserting herein a letter from the Assistant Commissioner for Legislation, Dr. Albert Alford, of the Office of Education of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. You will note that Mr. Alford confirms my statement on the House floor that the President had no choice but to obligate the expenditures of all the moneys appropriated by reason of the law and his agreement with the Members of Congress.

The letter follows:

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE,
OFFICE OF EDUCATION,
Washington, D.C., March 25, 1970.

HON. BENJAMIN B. BLACKBURN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BLACKBURN: In response to an inquiry by Mr. Drew Tidwell of your staff, let me state the following facts as I understand them relative to the appropriations for Impact Aid for Fiscal Year 1970.

The President had originally requested $187 million for Fiscal Year 1970 for Public Law 874. The first appropriations bill passed by the House and the Senate agreed on a figure of $585 million for the program. After vetoing the first appropriations measure, and after his veto was sustained, the President recommended $425 million for this program. The House Appropriations Committee in reporting out the second bill recommended $505.4 million. This amount of money was agreed to by the Senate and sent to the President for signature.

The President in signing H.R. 15931 agreed to the conditions of the bill which required the full expenditure of the $505.4 million. This will be done and the figure has not been reduced as a part of the 2 percent overall reduction in the total appropriations.

It should be emphasized that while the administration would have preferred its earlier figure of $187 million or its subsequent offer of $425 million, it will obligate the full $505.4 million appropriation. The Administration feels that it is essential to amend the Impact Aid program to remove its inequities and has submitted the Impact Aid Reform Act of 1970 to provide the necesary changes. Hearings on this proposal are currently being held by the General Subcommitte on Education.

If the Office of Legislation can be of further assistance, please let us know.

Sincerely yours,

ALBERT L. ALFORD,
Assistant Commissioner for Legislation.

JULIUS HOCHMAN

(Mr. RYAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, March 17, Julius Hochman died. Former vice president of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union and former general manager of the New York Dress Joint Board, as well as a founder of the Liberal Party, Julius Hochman was the true self-made, self-educated man. An immigrant to this country at the age of 15, Julius Hochman rose to intellectual and political eminence.

Julius Hochman was a man who took full advantage of the opportunities that America had to offer. And to his great credit, and to our great benefit, he fought to secure these opportunities for us all.

The following is the obituary memorializing Mr. Hochman's life which appeared in the March 21, 1970, issue of the New York Times:

JULIUS HOCHMAN OF I.L.G.W.U. DIES

(By Burton Lindheine)

Julius Hochman, a retired vice president of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union and former general manager of its New York Dress Joint Board, was found dead at his home, 321 West 24th Street, on Thursday. He was 78 years old and apparently died of a heart attack Tuesday.

Mr. Hochman served as a union official for 46 years until his retirement in 1962. He was widely known as an innovator in industrial relations, a crusader for new techniques in collective bargaining, an advocator of style promotion and a specialist in adult education and the problems facing the aging worker.

In the nineteen-thirties, he was a strong proponent of the Congress of Industrial Organizations in his union, and some of his critics suggested that his huge eyebrows sometimes made him think he was John L. Lewis, the late leader of the Mine Workers Union.

BORN IN BESSARABIA

He was born in Bessarabia Jan. 12, 1892, and came to the United States at 15, having already served for three years as a tailor in Europe. He joined Local 23 during the great cloakmakers' strike in 1910 and embarked on a systematic program of reading that ranged through the social sciences and the arts. He later supplemented these studies with courses at the Rand School of Social Sciences and Brookwood Labor College.

In 1916, the union became a constant concern and the welfare, health and happiness of 100,000 dressmakers of the New York Dress Joint Board, and his chief goal.

Mr. Hochman began as business agent of Garment Workers' Local 25, then became an international representative and organizer in Chicago and a manager for the Dressmaker Union here. In 1923, he led his first general strike in New York and later was a striker leader in Toronto, Montreal and Boston.

In 1929—after a Communist attempt to seige control of the union was smashed with his aid—he became general manager of the Dress Joint Board. He had been named a vice president of the international union in 1925.

Under Mr. Hochman's leadership, dressmakers won the 40-hour week in 1923. In 1941, he called on employers to eliminate production and managerial waste and drew up the plan for a large-scale promotion campaign focusing on the creation of the New York Dress Institute.

He led the dressmakers' strike here in 1958 and afterward left the Dress Joint Board to direct the union's new label department. He retired from union activity in 1962.

As an industrial statesman, Mr. Hockman developed a rate schedule for garment workers to minimize the impact of inflation and helped to set up an elaborate arbitration system.

LED AMERICAN LABOR PARTY

Active in politics, Mr. Hochman had been a leader in the American Labor party and, when the Communists took over that party, helped to create the Liberal party. He was also a leader in aiding Jewish victims of World War II and had been a vice president, vice chairman of the executive committee and a director of the World ORT Union.

Because of his broad cultural interests, his preoccupation with the life of the mind and his consuming interest in the works of Dr. Sigmund Freud, the father of psychoanalysis, Mr. Hochman was sometimes called "The Professor" by colleagues.

For his part, he saw no paradox in the fact that a labor leader had intellectual interests. Indeed, he was convinced that the philosopher and the labor leader have a common denominator—creativity.

He once lectured to a group of doctors on a thought suggested by a footnote in the writings of Freud. The lecture dealt with the retirement of the aged—to which he was opposed—and became a part of his book "The Retirement of the Aged," published in 1950. Mr. Hochman's books also included "Industrial Planning Through Collective Bargaining" (1941) and "Why This Strike?" (1936).

ADM. JOHN S. McCAIN, JR., OUR DISTINGUISHED COMMANDER IN CHIEF IN THE PACIFIC

(Mr. STRATTON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, the March issue of Reader's Digest carried an excellent article on one of the great military leaders of our time, Adm. John S. McCain, Jr., U.S. Navy.

He is currently serving as Commander in Chief Pacific. Admiral McCain has appeared before the Armed Services Committee on numerous occasions, and has set a high mark for his candor on difficult and frequently controversial diplomatic and security issues. I admire and respect Admiral McCain for his courage and inspiring leadership during these troubled days in the Pacific Ocean areas. He is a leader with conviction. He keeps an open mind and a sense of humor.

Mr. Speaker, because so many of our Members know Admiral McCain and hold him in such high regard because of his distinguished service here on the Hill as chief of legislative liaison for the Navy, I felt the profile in Reader's Digest should be included in the RECORD and I recommend it to all Members. Here is one of our great military leaders, and we can be proud of him.

The article follows:

SENTINAL OF THE PACIFIC—JACK MCCAIN, THE GINGERY WARRIOR-DIPLOMAT CHARGED WITH PATROLLING THE BIGGEST BEAT IN MILITARY HISTORY

(By John G. Hubbell)

The scene at Hickam Air Force Base, Hawaii, could have been written for James Bond. The last three numbers on the big jet are 007; its pilot's name is Capt. Harold Liberty. The interior of the plane is a marvelous complex of teleprinter machines spewing forth an endless stream of intelligence, alongside a battery of telephones by which instant contact can be made with the White House, the Pentagon, or any other major U.S. command post on earth, sea or in the air.

A black limousine rolls planeside, and there emerges a figure who couldn't possibly look less like James Bond—a silver-haired, slightly stoop-shouldered, cigar-chomping wisp of a man, whose responsibility for free-world security would give pause to any fictional hero. This is CINCPAC—Commander in Chief Pacific—Adm. John S. McCain, Jr., 59, boss of all U.S. military forces in an 85-million-square-mile area from the west coast of the Americas to the middle of the Indian Ocean—the largest single area of military responsibility in history.

Primarily, the McCain job is to defend the United States against attack through the Pacific region, and to protect our vital interests throughout the Far East. More than 300 million free Asians depend to a large extent for their continued freedom on how well he performs his mission.

ON PATROL

McCain walks quickly to the plane and embarks on a patrol of his long beat. This time, there will be a Southeast Asia Treaty Organization military-representatives meeting in Bangkok, Thailand, then another close-up look at the Vietnam war. "The communists have chosen to make Vietnam the testing ground for their so-called wars of national liberation," he says. "If they can make this kind of aggression work there, we can expect to be faced with more such wars elsewhere. We are there to prove to them that it won't work."

CINCPAC's "incoming mail" basket holds more than enough to occupy McCain's attention while he is on the plane. The continuing program of Vietnamization and American troop redeployments will reduce authorized U.S. strength in Vietnam to 434,000 men by April. For McCain, this means endless hours of attention to logistic details and frequent meetings with Gen. Creighton W. Abrams, commander of U.S. forces in Vietnam.

In addition, broad strategic decisions must be evolved concerning developing patterns in McCain's area of responsibility. Chief among these are the now significant Soviet naval presence in the Indian Ocean, and the planned British military withdrawal from the Far East in 1971. McCain worries. The strategic importance of the area is symbolized, he points out, by the Malacca Strait, the gateway between the Indian and Pacific oceans, and a vital commercial lifeline.

He plows on through the morning's intelligence, learning that communist guerrillas are stepping up insurgency activities in Thailand, Laos and Burma. There has been more shooting in the Korean demilitarized zone where North Korea's belligerent dictator, Kim Il Sung, is keeping the pressure on.

McCain broods over each report from the immense, seething Command, wrings facts and opinions from staff officers, debates with them, fires off requests for more intelligence and judgments. Then, shirtsleeved, his tie loose, he roams the aircraft, chatting easily with everyone. Says a yeoman who has worked for McCain for years, "You always have the feeling that you are really involved in helping to get big, important things accomplished. Besides the work, he always wants to know what everyone thinks. I've seen him keep a V.I.P. waiting while he finished a conversation with a cabdriver."

McCain never misses a chance to talk to combat troops. "The enlisted man is the most important individual in the entire Defense establishment," he says. "Everything else is in support of the kid who stands on a piece of real estate with a rifle in his hands and says, 'This is mine.' "

CINCPAC pulls a navigator's watch from his pocket. Noting the time he frowns: the 500-m.p.h. flight is too slow. "I wish," he grumbles, "that I could get my hands on one of those Apollo capsules!"

MAKING OF A SEA DOG

Jack McCain has always been in a hurry. The first of three children, he was born in Council Bluffs, Iowa. At 16, he won a Presidential appointment to the Naval Academy at Annapolis. "That," he says, "was the last time I shone scholastically."

Midshipman McCain, although he was the youngest and smallest of plebes, lost no time in winning attention. He was given to taking unauthorized midnight leave, and spent much of his four Naval Academy years in contention with authority and working off massive doses of extra duty. Graduating in 1931 near the bottom of his class, he was not considered an outstanding candidate for success. He was ordered to the battleship Oklahoma. The battlewagon's size, range, and firepower imbued him with a sense of the real meaning of seapower. And since junior officers were in constant contact with enlisted men—forcing them to develop as leaders—Ensign McCain began becoming an officer.

In the middle 1930s, McCain volunteered for submarine duty, and applied a meticulous vigor to learning the undersea warfare business. Then, despite his earlier performance at the Naval Academy, he was ordered there as an instructor in electrical engineering and physics. To take on the midshipmen, he prepared himself as carefully as for war. "I learned a lot more about leadership during that stretch," he says. "One thing I had going for me was that I knew all the angles and tricks. The lads learned soon enough never to try to hoodwink an old hoodwinker."

By the time the United States entered World War II, McCain had his first command, the submarine O-8, a World War I boat used for training at New London, Conn. In August 1942, he took command of the newly commissioned submarine Gunnel, and helped guide the assault boats to the beaches during the North African landings. He later made five war patrols in the Pacific, where he sank 21,000 tons of enemy shipping and a Japanese destroyer.

Then came a postwar tour of duty in the Records Section of the Navy's Bureau of Personnel. "I was mad when I got that job," he recalls. "It seemed like a dull assignment. But later I was grateful, because it familiarized me with the problems of personnel administration, which is a tool worth having if you are to deal successfully with large numbers of people." He ended that stint by submitting a long paper to the Chief of Naval Operations, advising that the most effective way to make young officers ready for high command would be to take them out of their air, surface or submarine specialties, and provide them with across-the-board training and experience. This revolutionary concept caused a great, angry stir and was summarily discarded. It has since been adopted in all the services.

Later, as a captain in the Pentagon, McCain outspokenly deplored the fact that the Navy seemed to be a collection of separate, rival services. He rounded up six other like-minded captains, and they met weekly to trade ideas aimed at unifying the Navy. McCain's forthright attitudes drew the admiring attention of the then Chief of Naval Operations, Adm. Arleigh Burke, who thenceforth required the captain's presence at the frequent meetings he held with his top admirals.

"THEY RESPECT YOU FOR IT"

By late 1958, McCain was himself a rear admiral and the Navy's chief liaison officer on Capitol Hill, where he proved himself a persuasive spokesman. When the Navy won a hard fight for the restoration of funds vital to its aircraft-carrier construction program, a group of officers congratulated Secretary of the Navy William Franke. "If you think I'm responsible, you're wrong," Franke told them. "It came down to one man—Jack McCain."

In 1962, just as the Cuban missile crisis was getting under way, McCain became Navy Chief of Information. During the crisis, military men were prohibited from discussing it with newsmen. McCain would plant persistent reporters on a couch in his office and, cheerfully ignoring their pleas for information, would regale them for hours with detailed lectures on the then budding but little-recognized (now fullblown and fully recognized) Soviet naval threat. "I didn't want the missile crisis to be a complete waste of time for them," he says with a grin. "I wanted to help with their education."

In the spring of 1965, as a vice admiral commanding the Atlantic Fleet's amphibious forces, he displayed his ability in spectacular fashion when President Lyndon Johnson ordered him to isolate the Dominican Republic, which was undergoing a political upheaval, until order was restored. Moving with lightning speed, McCain clamped a tight military vise on the country. "Some people condemned this as an 'unwarranted intervention,' " McCain says, "but the communists were all set to move in and take over. People may not love you for being strong when you have to be, but they respect you for it and learn to behave themselves when you are."

McCain's next assignment was as military adviser to the U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, at that time Arthur Goldberg. Then came two years as Commander in Chief U.S. Naval Forces Europe. When the quietly brilliant Adm. U.S. Grant Sharp retired as Commander in Chief Pacific in mid-1968, Jack McCain was the logical choice to succeed him.

Although he is the son of an admiral (who died a few days after World War II ended) and perhaps the nation's leading exponent of seapower, McCain is a violent advocate of inter-service cooperation. "One thing several wars have taught us is that teamwork is absolutely vital," he says. "If we are going to do our job effectively, we had damned well better work as a team. In Vietnam, we have been doing just that."

To keep the Pacific team on its toes, McCain pops constant phone calls and unannounced visits on his component commanders. "He's always got plenty of ideas and questions," says one officer, "and you'd better have the answers ready."

Nonstop Mission. Making his Pacific rounds aboard the 007, McCain lands in Bangkok and spends days conferring with SEATO allies. Then he flies on to Saigon to meet with Gen. Creighton Abrams. He is Abrams' immediate military superior and is in virtually constant communication with him, but is appalled that anyone might think he would tell Abrams how to manage the war. "That would be like telling Babe Ruth how to hit home runs," he says. He helicopters and walks miles through the battle zones, observing and talking to the troops, explaining to them why it is necessary that they by there, how proud he is of them and the job they are doing, how eager he is to get home.

(He hopes the war may be brought to an early and successful conclusion for a personal reason, too: his son, Lt. Cdr. John S. McCain III, 34, a naval aviator, has been a prisoner of war in North Vietnam since October 1967.)

Then, after 12 exhausting days, there is a long, working flight through ten time zones back to Hawaii. It is noon when the McCain troupe lands at Hickam. Some of his staff are in a daze. Not CINCPAC. He strides from 007, a man absorbed in his mission, shouting through his cigar, "Let's get up to the office and get some work done. We've got to get out and deal with that Okinawa situation on Friday, and while we're at it we may as well go on and look at Korea."

THE LATE ROBERT W. STANLEY, MANAGING EDITOR OF THE AMSTERDAM, N.Y., EVENING RECORDER

(Mr. STRATTON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, earlier this month my home city of Amsterdam lost one of its truly great leaders, Bob Stanley, managing editor of the Amsterdam Evening Recorder. Bob Stanley's editorials were read and pondered by every citizen of our community. He called the shots as he saw them, with clear vision, with courage, with wit, sometimes sharply, more often compassionately, and always in an arresting and stimulating fashion. In many ways Bob Stanley, with his pen, led the way to the new Amsterdam that is now growing on the banks of the historic Mohawk River.

All of us have lost a real friend in Bob Stanley's passing. To honor his contributions to our city and our country I include herewith an editorial on Robert Stanley from the Amsterdam Evening Recorder of March 5, 1970:

OUR LOSS AND YOURS

The Recorder feels deep loss in the death of Robert W. Stanley, who has been our managing editor and editorial page spokesman since 1953, and we are sure the community senses the void his passing leaves.

Bob Stanley was managing editor in a period which saw Amsterdam plunge into economic depths and then begin the long process of hauling itself up by its bootstraps; he was managing editor during the period when Amsterdam began to remake itself from an old city to an exciting modern one, with glistening future. He was not just an observer. His editorials often showed the way when the path ahead was not easily discerned. His words lent encouragement when it was needed; they could be scathingly critical if conditions or a situation seemed to demand this approach, but one of his staunchest beliefs was that The Recorder editorial voice must never become a common scold.

In his work he was a perfectionist, probably partly due to his background in the printing trade, and nothing pained him more than a sloppily written news story or a typographical blunder. His career was in keeping with the best traditions of a long line of distinguished Recorder managing editors, including his immediate predecessor, the late Earl O. Stowitts, whom many still remember fondly.

Bob Stanley's colleagues at The Recorder and the circle of friends who knew him best found him to be warm, understanding and intelligent, always ready with a quick and witty quip and possessing a real zest for living life to its fullest.

We at The Recorder extend our heartfelt sympathies to Bob's wife, Helen, and to their daughter Mrs. Robin B. Welch.

Perhaps our editor wrote his own epitaph best in an editorial, Growing Old Gracefully, published only yesterday. It ended in this manner:

"So what to do? Sit back and wither in our rocking chairs? Certainly not. Live life to the fullest possible—that's what. This leaves less time for staring into the mirror and worrying about that latest wrinkle."

TWO YOUNG LEADERS OF AMSTERDAM, N.Y., LOOK TO THE FUTURE

(Mr. STRATTON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, we often wonder what our young people really think about their home communities, and their Nation. We are often concerned about whether they will be able to take over their share of the leadership in the days ahead.

At a recent dinner meeting of the John F. Kennedy Club in Amsterdam, N.Y., my home city, I had the privilege of hearing two outstanding young people of Amsterdam give their views of what the future holds.

John Allen, a student at the Lynch High School and Janet Messineo of Bishop Scully High School were the speakers. Because I was so impressed with their remarks, I include here an article from the Amsterdam Evening Recorder, summarizing both speeches, and also the text of Mr. Allen's remarks. I believe you will find them most interesting.

The material follows:

KENNEDY CLUB LEARNS WHAT'S ON MIND OF YOUNG PEOPLE FROM TWO SPEAKERS

"Don't poor mouth Amsterdam." This was part of the advice given by Lynch High student John Allen to members and guests at the second annual J. F. Kennedy Club installation dinner-dance, Saturday night at St. John's Hall.

Allen and Bishop Scully senior Janice Messineo were the guest speakers and they spoke about parents, families and the city of Amsterdam.

Correlating with a scene from the musical "Carousel," Allen touched on three topics: "A star, a slap and some advice."

Asking the people present if they had ever seriously looked at the city of Amsterdam by starlight, he said the one star on which most young people here want to hang, is the star of optimism.

"Young people may not sound optimistic when you hear about the bomb, drugs and no rules," he continued. "But they really are. They make plans for the future, marriage, college and are trying to earn money in order to own things. He urged the adults not to lose the happy outlook of youth.

Allen told the adults present to "scold us for not speaking well of our city," as he touched upon the slap. "We hear too much about the good old days in Amsterdam," he said, charging the people to look toward the future and "praise our place."

The young Lynch senior cited the "two hospitals, Clare Bacon School, new schools coming, the Truway exist, a newspaper that helps the YMCA, Veterans' Park" and forthcoming apartments as examples of what is making the city grow.

"Believe that Amsterdam is improving and can improve in the future," he told the people.

SOMETHING IN COMMON

Janice Messineo spoke about "something we have in common, the United States of America."

Talking about the recent riots that have run rampant from coast to coast, she said, "Mabye the rioters don't know about the three virtues which built our nation."

"First there was hope. Pilgrims came over hoping for a new freedom: freedom of religion and they found it."

"Then there was faith. In the next decade, men had faith they could build a better nation, faith in themselves and in their country. They fought, sweat and died for this faith. Men like George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Alexander Hamilton and Benjamin Franklin."

"These men also hoped and they saw their hope and faith rewarded with a Declaration of Independence, a new Constitution, a new nation: the United States of America. Faith was borne."

The last of the three, she cited, was peace. "This virtue was a little harder to obtain. When the United States entered World War I, II and the Korean War, the goal was peace. It's true the men killed and were killed. They destroyed and were destroyed, but at long last, peace was borne.

"What have we now?" she asked the audience. "What virtues are the driving force in our countries?"

Answering her own question, she said, "It can't be hope. People today feel we have everything. We don't have to hope anymore. We don't even have to care. Selfishness was born. It can't be a drive for peace. Oh, they cry for peace, but won't fight for it."

"Those of you who still feel these virtues, pass them on. By being the best possible citizens, we can revive hope, faith and peace and then, maybe, we can once again start the flame of pride burning in the hearts of Americans."

Supervisor Thomas McNamara, toastmaster, said, "We should be proud of our youth," following the speech. "I think we have proven here tonight we do have good youth in Amsterdam."

REMARKS OF JOHN R. ALLEN AT KENNEDY CLUB DINNER, FEBRUARY 21, 1970

For a moment would you imagine with me a scene from the musical "Carousel".

The scene is in the backyard of heaven, the time is anytime and the characters are Billy, a young man who has just committed suicide because he couldn't support his wife and he found out that his wife is expecting a child, and a character called the Starkeeper, a wise old man. As the scene opens, the Starkeeper is seen standing on a ladder, dusting stars on a celestial clothesline. The Starkeeper immediately begins to question Billy and he asked him if he would like to go back to earth for a day to finish any unfinished business that he might have. Billy flatly refuses. He is afraid to go back. In the course of the questioning Billy finds that his child has been born and that it is a daughter. He also learns that she is now 15 years old and very unhappy and needs help very badly. Immediately Billy wants to go back down to earth to help her. He takes with him a star to give to her, thinking that might make her happy. She is afraid of the star and when Billy offers it to her she refuses it. Billy gets angry and slaps her. The next time we see Billy, he is at his daughters graduation and here he meets a new character, Dr. Seldon, who looks very much like the Starkeeper. He gives the graduating class some advice.

To-night I would like to give us three things from "Carousel" that we can learn something from. They are a star, a slap and some advice. The star is the kind of optimism that young people always seem to have. The slap is to help us stop a bad habit that we all seem to have here in Amsterdam. The advice is to have faith that Amsterdam has a bright future.

First let's talk about the star. For a moment let's go back to the story of "Carousel". The Starkeeper has a star hung over Philadelphia to beautify the city. A good example of stars beautifying a city can be observed by anyone happening to travel the Thruway and pass Amsterdam at night. The stars overhead make the city a beautiful site. But the star that I would like to hang in Amsterdam is one of youthful optimism.

You may think that the youth of today do not exhibit many optimistic qualities. This is because, unfortunately, the youth we read about in the newspapers are the minority that speak about the end of world coming soon and that the bomb will kill us all, that drugs are the only way to get away from reality and that we need a society with no rules. But the majority of youth today are very optimistic and this is proven by the way they make plans. If you were to ask any high school junior or senior what he planned to do after high school for his future, a good percentage would say college, finding a job and then marriage.

The reason they go to college is so that they will have a preparation for the future, to meet the world and the challenges ahead of them. Just the fact that they plan ahead reflects their optimistic attitude. I would urge all of us to keep this happy outlook of the youth. Getting back to "Carousel" the girl was afraid to accept the star, but we don't have to be afraid because we know our star is good. The youth of Amsterdam have proven that to us.

Next the slap. The slap would be a warning against not to poor-mouth the city of Amsterdam. I like to scold all of us for not speaking well of our city at all times. We hear too much of the "good old days in Amsterdam" when the mills were in the city and everything was prosperous. But, let's face it, the mills are gone now. The people who worked in them have found new jobs, here in the city, or left the city.

Right now in Amsterdam we hear all the time that we have to get new people and new industry to move to our city. But being realistic, how can we expect people to come to a city whose own residents have nothing good to say about it. We can't. Also, we hear people say that we must keep the youth in our city, but in order to do so, the adults must boost the city to their children and make them want to stay. We must praise our place and make it appealing to ourselves and to others.

The third thing that we can take from "Carousel" is some advice and that is believe that Amsterdam has a bright future. In "Carousel," at the graduation exercises, the doctor says "you jest stand on yer own two feet. The world belongs to you as much as to the next feller. Don't give up! And try not to be skeered . . ." And who of us has to be scared about Amsterdam's future when we have: 1. Two hospitals. One practically new. 2. A fine school system. The Clara Bacon Elementary School is one of the finest in the northeast. People from all over the eastern part of the country come to see it and witness the education process there. 3. The promise of a new senior high school. 4. The Thruway Exit. We may take this for granted, but of all the cities on the Thruway throughout New York State, Amsterdam is the only one with an exit within the city limits. 5. A newspaper that helps. The Amsterdam Evening Recorder trys to boost our city and not just wash its dirty linen. 6. The YMCA. 7. The Veterans Field Park and swimming pool complex. 8. The new low-cost housing development and we have the promise for more apartments to be built in the future. My advice to us is to believe that Amsterdam is improving and can improve more in the future.

Now, as in "Carousel," I gave us the star—the plea for an optimistic viewpoint, the viewpoint of youth; the slap—a scolding for down-grading our city; and I gave the advice—to believe in Amsterdam's future. But, we cannot do this alone. The youth cannot do it by themselves and the adults cannot do it by themselves. We must do it together.

In closing, I can't help but quote once again from "Carousel."

"Walk on through the wind, walk on through the rain though your dreams be tossed and blown . . . walk on, walk on with hope in your heart, and you'll never walk alone. You'll never walk alone."

PRISON REFORM: A PARTIAL ANSWER TO THE CRIME CRISIS

(Mr. NEDZI asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. NEDZI. Mr. Speaker, the national increase in crime is, for ready reasons, a national preoccupation.

The law-abiding, peaceful citizen fears to walk in his own neighborhood at night. In our cities, particularly, one hesitates to travel downtown.

As we all know, the crime situation is not only bad in itself, but it has taken on a bitterly racial aspect. Crime is eating away at the precariously thin commodity of goodwill between the races. Crime and violence and the yen for reprisal are corroding the national ethic.

The United States must urgently and dramatically increase its investment not only in law enforcement and crime prevention, but in its corrections system. "Corrections" includes jails, prisons, probation, and parole.

The nationwide inadequacy of correction facilities, particularly for youthful offenders, is shameful to the point of scandal and disgrace.

Congress and the executive have not faced up to this problem.

I was surprised, frankly, that the report of the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence failed to include any recommendation whatever on prison facilities. A serious oversight.

It should also be noted that of the 13 major anticrime bills sent up by the Nixon administration in the first session of the 91st Congress, none related to the need to modernize our prisons and provide desperately needed facilities for hard-core juvenile offenders.

Furthermore, I regret that the President failed to mention prison reform in his state of the Union message of January 22, 1970.

The most overcrowded jails are located in metropolitan areas, but the need for action exists in every region of the country.

In my hometown, Detroit, one of the most respected men in the field, Judge James Lincoln of juvenile court, is faced with a heartbreaking lack of adequate juvenile corrections facilities. As a result, he must release hundreds of juvenile offenders, many incorrigible. They roam the streets, undetained and uncorrected.

Take Lorton Reformatory, well known to District of Columbia residents. It is not filled to 100 percent of capacity; it is filled to nearly 200 percent of capacity. No rehabilitation program has a chance in such circumstances. To the overcrowding add drugs, violence, homosexual rape, and the situation cries for our attention.

The young offender constitutes the largest and most virulent portion of the danger on the streets of our cities. His ricidivism rates are enormously high.

We simply must get them off the streets, then do a better job of saving them once they are off the streets.

Unless we obtain a national commitment on this particular aspect of the crime problem, no end to the crime spiral is in sight.

Any careful examination of the corrections complex will lead to the unhappy conclusion that "rehabilitation" is an empty phrase. Rehabilitation is nowhere a smashing success.

The first imperative is to isolate the dangerous and the incorrigible young criminals from society. The second imperative is to upgrade the people, the techniques, the facilities which make up the corrections system. An improvement in this aspect can have a multiplier effect in the other aspects.

There are now 1.3 million people under the supervision and restraint of Federal, State, and county corrections departments. One-third are behind bars, two-thirds under parole and probation. By 1975, the figure is expected to swell to 1.8 million.

Since experts agree that the Nation's prisons are the major breeding grounds for criminal careers, it is imperative that new efforts must be made at recidivism prevention.

I have studied this problem carefully. I have talked to judges, prosecutors, parole officers, policemen. Police morale is damaged by the revolving door system of the criminal courts in many jurisdictions. A policeman risks his life to make an arrest of a young, hardened, habitual offender, sees him released on bail, too often to commit more crimes, sees him finally tried and convicted, only to have a harried judge give him a suspended sentence. Inevitably, police are discouraged by this situation.

However, if the young offender who would be in jail but for the absence of suitable facilities, is put in jail, crime would decrease appreciably. In Detroit, for example, the jailing of 200 such offenders would decrease crime 25 percent, Judge Lincoln tells me. Police morale, and efficiency, would improve markedly.

UNMET PRISON NEEDS

The National Council on Crime and Delinquency took a close look at many State and local prison facilities in 1968, and found that an astounding 93 percent of all juvenile courts have no separate juvenile detention facilities. In Illinois, for example, only nine juvenile detention homes exist for the State's 102 counties, and only two of these are considered to meet reasonable standards.

Chronic overcrowding exists in both juvenile and adult facilities. One direct result is that law-abiding citizens continue to be terrorized by those who are in their midst only because of lack of cell space.

The phenomenon is by no means confined to a single State or region. State and local governments suffer from an inability to finance needed improvements even where public officials have an enlightened and deep concern for the problem.

Not only is detention space inadequate, but adult and juvenile institutions which do exist are, by and large, very old and in unsatisfactory condition.

Dramatic evidence of prison inadequacy is found in a recent report cited by the Council on Crime and Delinquency. Federal jail inspectors found the following in considering 622 institutions in 27 states:

Twenty-three percent of these jails were built before 1900.

Nineteen percent were built between 1901 and 1920.

Twenty-two percent were built between 1921 and 1940.

Twenty-two percent were built between 1941 and 1960.

Thirteen percent were built between 1961 and 1966.

These are the conditions at a time when violent crimes have increased 131 percent between 1960 and 1969.

It is estimated that nearly half of all such facilities in this country are over 50 years old—well beyond what is considered reasonable use. A great many cells are poorly lighted and ventilated, and contain no sanitary facilities of any kind.

THE BREAKDOWN IN PROBATION AND PAROLE

A sound probation and counseling program often makes the critical difference in holding down the rate of crime. We find, however, that these services are severely hampered by the inability of State and local governments to adequately finance them.

The President's Crime Commission found in 1965 that one-third of the 250 counties studied had no probation service at all.

The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare reported in 1969 that there was a nationwide need for 44,468 additional professional staff, 34,587 probation and parole officers, and 1,976 additional training personnel. Perhaps more disturbing is the report that while 2,500 additional diagnostic staff are needed today, total recruitment of only 120 is expected because of the inability of States to offer competitive salaries and job benefits. Turnover of staff is very heavy.

Treatment and training programs, like the work-release concept, receive a very small share of corrections budgets. For example, in the District of Columbia Department of Corrections, only 5 percent of moneys available have been allocated for treatment and training programs designed to rehabilitate offenders; 95 percent is used for the mere warehousing of prisoners. A change in emphasis is desirable.

A PROPOSAL

We have begun to recognize the need, but we have not yet made a significant commitment in attacking the problem.

I propose legislation calling for a total of $10 billion to be made available to the States, over the next 5 years, for improvements in corrections systems.

One billion dollars would be authorized for each of fiscal years 1971 and 1972; $2 billion for fiscal year 1973; and $3 billion for fiscal years 1974 and 1975.

The funds would be allocated to the States according to their respective populations, and would be in the form of matching grants, the States contributing 10 percent of the cost of juvenile-oriented programs and facilities, and 25 percent of the cost of adult institutions and projects. All corrections, improvements, and rehabilitative projects, including staffing costs, may be funded under these grants.

Local and State agencies would be required to submit programs to their respective State governments who would, in turn, present them to the Department of Justice. The State governments would be solely responsible for the administration of these projects, and for compliance with application and auditing procedures to be formulated by the Attorney General.

Any unused annual allocation would revert to a funding pool, from which additional moneys may be allocated to individual States on a showing of exceptional need to the Department of Justice.

The need is clear. It has been well analyzed. It is time for Congress to help the States do the job.

It is time to reverse the growing danger in our cities and in our prisons, and to restore to both offender and victim the opportunity to build useful lives in an atmosphere of security and freedom.

OUR MILITARY—TARGET OF A SMEAR

(Mr. RARICK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. RARICK. Mr. Speaker, Brig. Gen. Robert L. Scott, Jr., USAF, retired, is yet another of our true military heroes who understands the logical result of the subversive assault on our fighting men, and is touring our country trying to tell the story to the American people.

I include the text of one of his recent vital speeches at this point in the RECORD:

OUR MILITARY—TARGET OF A SMEAR

That there is a smear campaign there must be no doubt. For at least a decade everything possible has been done to destroy the morale of our Armed Services. Decision after decision by our powerful un-elected officials in our name—have sent our sons to fight for us in the hell-holes of the world. At the same time have not only refused them the right to fight and win—but have ordered them to lose. We have allowed such national disgraces as the Pueblo incident—not only failing our Servicemen but allowing them to be dishonored. Worse, we sat by and permitted respect for them to be eroded at home . . . by our own indifference, by our own gullibility—we helped destroy them.

No need to repeat other tragedies, we have learned to live with them so effortlessly they have become household words—our consciences are numb by now. Sum-up the situation by realizing we have been in a major war a long time, and have risked the lives of over a million men in combat without the military professional having anything much to do with the strategy except to die. We ordered them in—then denied them the same rights we gave the cowards and the demonstrators back home. Especially did we direct our air force not to strike military targets of the enemy, refused to let it touch much of the oil storage—made them literally sanctuaries, only three out of every ten ammunition targets ever struck . . . not because we could not have hit them—because we would not permit it. In fact—at least half of the identified top priority targets—strategic as well as tactical—declared "off-limits" . . . to our waiting airmen. More than a hundred vital positions—such as his (the enemy's) air defenses—SAM missile sites—granted amnesty. Over half his hydro-electric generating facilities likewise "sanctified"—sixty per cent of his transportation network awarded immunity. Do I need to add—how in hell could we expect our sons to win? We sent them in—then hand-cuffed them. . . . Made them lose; the only way Americans could ever have lost a war . . .

And, now we come to the lowest blow of all: The lies of My Lai . . .Communist lies—dug-up by our enemies as part of their sinister plan to help us help ourselves to achieve defeat. Because—should our military men insist on even defending themselves—and have to kill an enemy—court martial them as murderers . . . White Lieutenant Calley—Black Sergeant Mitchell . . . and on and on—to finally the last one to date—destroy the general who was there—we have to have high ranking scapegoats too . . . even if he has come back to be Superintendent of the US Military Academy at West Point . . . Oh—we don't need to worry about the draft as opposed to a volunteer Army, Navy, Marine Corps—or Air Force, Hells' Fire—no self-respecting man—no matter how dedicated would dare risk his honor—his integrity—his family's future—much less his life, in such a profession. Fellow Americans, make sure you write your senators and congressmen of that fact because I certify to you—as one who volunteered nearly fifty years ago—that you will never get any volunteers worth a damn for the type military professional you seem to want . . .

When I was a boy I would have crawled across the whole United States to enlist in the Army—with the ambition to someday wear the uniform of a West Point cadet. I'd have made the crawl over broken glass to know I'd wear the silver wings of an Air Force pilot—any wings, of any pilot in any of the armed services of our Country. I prayed for years for such ambitions to be fulfilled—and they were and now—this near half-century later—I wish to God I could feel the same way—because I have loved every one of my 34 years in uniform and each of the thousands of hours I have flown fighter planes and even the unarmed transport planes—in combat. Why, I came close to doing all those things I dreamed of . . . for the greatest Nation in all the world . . . The tragedy is—that here now I do not see how any young man would ever select a career in the Armed Services of the USA—and want to wear any of those hallowed uniforms . . . I believe there has been a systematic, meticulous, most subtle destructive campaign to destroy the very ambitions mentioned—by a ruthless enemy—. And a good bit of that campaign has been through the use or the co-operation of our own do-good society . . .

Either by positive plan of our enemies or as some kind of a "fringe benefit" by people among us—calling themselves: Americans—our military profession has been made a much maligned laughing stock. A trap for fools—a public disgrace. Not that it is any disgrace—I hastily stop to make clear—but with malice intended—it has been made to appear that way . . .

A couple of years ago, when I returned from one of my trips to Viet Nam—I was asked as a retired general officer from another war—to act as escort for eighteen dead heroes of this generation—their remains, my order said. So, I felt honored and brought them back home in those pathetic plastic bags. Then another form of dishonor—was soon apparent: We, those bodies of our dead—and I—had to virtually slip back as unobtrusively as possible—into our homeland. . . . Once, the land of the Free—and the Home of the Brave . . . Because I maintain that while those men were the bravest of any generation—we have ceased to be very brave back here—we who send them out—and refuse to see that they come home on their shields—in dignity . . . Why did we have to come that way? Because there was fear of demonstrations and maybe riots or a moratorium against the war in which those men had died . . . Demonstrations, sit-ins or something by small batches of misbegotten unkempt and disrespectful youth—whom our modern education and information and entertainment media keeps insisting over and over—as faithfully portraying the entire present generation. That generation—represented certainly in great part—by those fine brave men I brought home. Therefore, while my talk has been billed under the title: The American Military—Target of a Smear . . . It seems to me a more apt one might be: Pardon us—While We Slash Our Wrists—and Destroy Ourselves. . . .

That is exactly what we are doing with our My Lai and The Pueblo and what we make a profession of doing awfully well . . . We seem to have developed a self-flagellation complex; bedeviled as political masochists . . . Let us get down to the cold facts and not only admit it but shout it to the world. . . . Peace—not war is our most precious gift to this world . . . That and the last bastion of freedom left here . . . Yet, you can pick up almost any newspaper, listen to any radio program—look at any television; even part of what they call: entertainment, on the tube—and you will be assailed by a bill of fare of quite the opposite. We are told we are warmongers; that we are the aggressors in Vietnam—told so many times we get to thinking maybe we are. We sit courteously still while some of our political leaders—with as high offices as several senators say to multi-millions of us—that we have brought all this misery upon the world and that collectively we should be ashamed. That we are furthermore the persecutors of the Viet Cong and the poor innocent people of Hanoi . . . These men and even our do-gooders we permit to go to visit our enemies and damn their nation (our nation) and our men fighting for us—wield great propaganda because their words are shouted on the major media networks. Those three senators were then campaigning for the highest job in this land of ours—the presidency. Well, we neither nominated or elected either one—but others we never elected either—not to any political job—have kept right on managing our foreign policy and keeping our military professional from winning . . . One of them—McNamara, gone now from a Defense job to handling higher finances—set out with personal ven-detta to destroy the integrity of the military professional from the private to the general—and from the looks of things—may very well have succeeded. Oh, I don't blame R. Strange McNamara or any of the others never elected—always appointed managers of our destiny—I blame ourselves for sitting still all that time and doing nothing more positive than watch.

When I came home from China in 1943—from my bush league war—leading the Flying Tigers and working under the command of a great general by the name of Chennault—I was given a parade in my hometown. A Robert Scott Day was proclaimed in my state . . . I never was permitted to buy a drink if I entered a bar . . . I was beat on my back so much in adulation and called a hero so often—I must have come to have the hallucination that maybe I was one . . . How Green Was My Valley—then. Now, how blighted is the return of the real heroes today! These modern Jobs of ours—our military come home.

Better men than we ever were—giving up more, magnificently trained and motivated—skilled in better weapons; denied a life at home in the best years of their lives. Sent abroad to a dinky little beach-head they could have stormed and enveloped in a week—with the correct strategy, instead, after they were there—ordered not to hurt anybody, not to fight to win . . . Finally, when he comes home, maybe in that plastic bag—we sit still and permit utter vermin to demonstrate against him. We sit still and indifferently watch the desecration of the flag the hero died for . . . Those who make it home, we sometimes watch him too, beat on the head until he is dead. There are those times,when he's already dead—and they cannot kill him again—we take part as idle spectators—as radicals and mobs kill his wife and family instead. We but stand in the wings and watch—it is a bad dream—it will all go away . . . Our Supreme Court will find a loop-hole as they make new laws to protect the anarchists we harbor among us . . . And again—I reiterate, WE, not the mobs are at fault. WE, not the Supreme Court—at fault. And that is why I am here—that and the memory that I lost many of my men in combat—back there two or three wars ago—and they can never speak again and so I must—for them. . . .

I repeat, peace, not war—not aggression either, is our legacy to this messed-up world. And I defy the enemy—the Communists abroad as well as some right here among us—to prove otherwise. No matter how the busy Communists have stacked the decks of world opinion along with some type American opinion here at home. Apparently stacked a good bit by some remote use of our news and educational media . . . using our own television tubes. . . .

As an old fighter pilot—and I suppose, no matter how young I feel—have to admit now to being an old soldier too—I certify to you with all my heart and soul that nobody ever assured any kind of peace, protected any loved ones, home and country . . . unless they were ready to stand up and fight—even be ready to die for that peace. It cannot be assured either by sending your brave men to fight and then refusing to permit them to fight—even when the enemy has used the unexpected guile of making that war the most unpopular war—here on our own doorstep, in all history. . . .

"The condition upon which God hath given liberty to man is eternal vigilence; which condition—if he break; servitude is at once the consequence of his crime and the punishment for his guilt" (a quote from John Philpot Curran—way back there in 1790—just after those first Americans had the courage to sign a paper called the Declaration of Independence—which I imagine was unpopular with the fainthearted—fair-weather Americans—then too).

Tonight, while it is a pleasure to speak to each of you and I thank you very much for giving up a few hours of your lives to be concerned enough to come and hear me—I am going to try and concentrate my thoughts from now on . . . primarily on Young America. Because no matter how important we may be as that Silent Majority—an older and more mature majority—every other American today is virtually a teen-ager . . . That adds-up to just about one hundred million of them—and the gap will be getting wider for a long time. Thus, it is imperative we get through to them. Not that we want to dictate to them—even change them—but to see that their real image is the one depicted on the media as their true representation. The one shown me on TV has evidently not been taught the truth . . . It seems to have learned that life is supposed to be easy and uncomplicated . . . That it must be changed drastically—right now . . . And changed ONLY as revolutionary radicals can effect that change. Let us assure this priceless generation that we know from experience that history proves otherwise . . . And anybody, any generation, any nation, any civilization—ignoring history, is doomed to repeat the mistakes of the past . . .

Again—why is this so important?

Surely we remember our first real confrontation with Communism? It was Korea . . . General William F. Dean—one of our Army Commanders out there—was captured by the enemy and tortured as a prisoner for over two years . . . Inhumanly, they almost murdered him—gradually, while the United Nations did nothing and our America did just about as much. At last, when General Dean was wasted away to near death—they used him more sadistically as propaganda to show the world how magnanimous Communists are . . . and announced they were releasing him. So he was escorted to the seventeenth parallel, or someplace like that—where he'd walk across a bridge to freedom at last . . . Oh, how General Dean could taste that freedom—he could not suppress a smile in his anticipation. That was when the Red Chinese psychologist, one of a team or torturers that had been trying to break him and make him confess for those years—said":

"General, you grin at leaving our hospitality. Don't you know we will soon be with you again? You see, we don't need you any more—you have served our purpose. But we are going to capture your country!" . . .

When General Dean asked how—the Communists replied:

"We are going to destroy the moral character of a generation of your children. When we have finished with them—you will have nothing with which to defend yourselves against us." . . .

Sinister words? Spoken brazenly as a programmed threat to our civilization. And has there not been such a plan carried out??? More and more demonstrations every month since then . . . university campuses taken over—antiwar, anti-American—anti-anything marches . . . More and more dope addicts among the young . . . Therefore, if we believe the press and the radio and TV—combine—we have had it . . . Well, I do not believe it yet—that this generation is gone . . . Oh, for some reason I think the mass media has used a selected few as sensational examples, or examples of their much needed "sensationalism' if you want it that way—enough to make many of us believe that this generation is represented and has been twisted and destroyed as that Chi-Com Psychologist claimed . . . But, I still have faith that the great majority of our young Americans have moral and patriotic character as fine as any other generation. Because regardless of what most of the media depicts as representative of that crucial generation over all—I have faced a good many of them on those more than two hundred college and university campuses—and while I always met some radicals—I was always of the opinion that the great majority were fine Americans—believing in the same things I believe in. More than that—I have visited Viet Nam—been where the action is—and visited the real heroes—the black ones—the brown ones—and the white . . . That generation is all right—maybe it is the control somebody, other than a real American patriot has over the mass media that is all wrong . . . Seems like Vice President Spiro Agnew feels about the same way—if I interpret correctly what he was talking about a few months ago . . .

Then, as recently as March 15th—TV news commentator Howard K. Smith made a candid admission that he believes there is a pro-liberal network news bias. Mr. Agnew recited this same bias . . . put it as strong as possible that such bias distorted the political debate necessary in our nation—and openly criticized what he called: the "unelected elite" . . . which day after day presents its narrow interpretations as the only interpretations. Then, we can never forget how instantly—the three presidents of NBC, CBS and ABC—fairly leaped to their own defense on their own network's prime time. Over and over they repeated the charge that the Vice President had advocated censorship of the untouchable press and other news media . . . accusing Mr. Agnew with every innuendo of the big lie technique of the Nazis and the Communists . . . Surely to cloud the real issue which had been honestly raised by our Vice President. . . .

Mr. Agnew went out of his way to say that night when it all started that he was opposed to censorship. That, of course—was months ago . . . So now when Howard K. Smith comes along—who by his own admission is slightly left of center—at least a "semi-socialist", he says . . . and admits he is deeply concerned that the preponderence of a uniform, dogmatic, liberal bias does exist on network radio and television and in the press—and it is bad for them (the networks) as well as the nation . . . I figure Mr. Agnew ought to be smiling. . . .

Howard K. Smith continued to insist that this strong bias conformed to a rigid liberal party line in which network newsmen were primarily interested in pleasing each other and the editors of the New York Times and the Washington Post. They concentrate on the militant blacks and the new left white zanies—they depict irrational radicals as perfectly normal protests—and worst of all, they represent present day youth as being the image in-toto made by that hairy, dirty and uninhibited one or two per cent we see so often. All this projected into our family lives each hour on the hour on that educational and entertainment Boob Tube.

This last is what I fear—not that this generation has departed us. . . .

A few weeks ago I had the privilege of helping make awards to the Five Outstanding Young Men of my home state of Georgia. . . . Considering that these Americans were all extraordinary and they most likely represented the other young people of this generation—I confidently expected the news media down there in Central Georgia—and even the wire services—to advertise proudly the accomplishments of those honored five. . . . One, a US Congressman, another is president of a life insurance company, the third at just over 30 is Director of Personnel for the Trust Company of Georgia. . . . Number four, a young man, less than thirty—by the name of Nolan Murrah, Jr., vice president of the Royal Crown Cola Company. And last—a young man named Don Smith—who at thirty has served three years in Viet Nam—is now a quadra-plegic—totally paralyzed except from the neck up . . . legs cut off—imprisoned forever in a wheel chair. Who, regardless refuses to accept defeat, no matter what the nagging pain which is with him all the time—physically and mentally. A resident of the Veterans' Hospital in Dublin, Georgia. Yet, with all those strikes of fate against him—Curtis Donald Smith was named Citizen of the Year in 1969 by the Laurens County Civitan Club. . . . Also, last year—was Honorable Coach of the NCAA Basketball Tournament—for his work with young people. All that and Don Smith paralyzed except in heart and soul and will. . . . Has himself lifted in his wheel-chair to the top of a truck each day and coaches his football teams and inspires young Americans to still love this great Country. . . . He is those kids' Coach of All The Years—and that was why the Georgia Junior Chamber of Commerce selected him this year.

What I am getting to is that I was surprised after that Saturday night affair in the Macon Coliseum.—Sunday morning and on and on—there was never a mention by the radio or television or the press of either Congressman Williamson S. Stuckey, Jr., Donald K. Miller, Wade Truetlin Mitchell, Nolan Murrah, Jr., or Curtis Donald Smith—all of whom—I maintain do represent this young America. YET—that same blind or deaf or indifferent—or worse, media did have time and space to print across their front pages and clutter the airwaves with the accomplishments of the Chicago Seven—sentenced the day before by Judge Hoffman for destroying the dignity of his Court—for making obscene threats to both himself and this Country—making a mockery of justice. . . . So, I am forced to ask you and ask this media I condemn—why? I could understand something more important taking such from the front page—maybe they ran out of prime time . . . yet there was time and space for that filthy seven—they were presented "hot mikes" on national television—at that time which I think costs about six thousand dollars a minute . . . to blaspheme over and over their sordid threats to some sixty million watchers of the tube. . . . Thus public opinion and world images—are molded again the wrong way. . . . Are we fools?

So, back to the more appropriate: Pardon us—while we help get rid of our civilization. . . . We are responsible—not the combine of Press and TV and Radio . . . because we sit and stare and indifferently let a little bit more of America go down the drain each day. . . . It is high time we faced the facts of life. Don't we realize yet that we have one real positive sadistic enemy striving and plotting each second to destroy us? Dedicated and willing to wait a hundred years for his way—if he has to. Communists are absolutely confident they are going to supersede our civilization as they destroy us. Why are we set on helping them all we can? We are doing just that—watching it destroyed all around us by people who call themselves Americans. One more example—all right!

Take this thing our eager news media call The Massacres at My Lai. Another Communist tactic . . . The real battle for Viet Nam never has been fought offensively in the rice paddies, the jungles or the villages of that sad country. But right here at home in the press and on the air waves with all the super-educational technology of television. The Communists decided long ago never to face us openly. They knew we would never attack them first—we have promised. So, give us enough rope and we will hang ourselves in their own propaganda. What a statement, but think about it. They dug-up the evidence at My Lai—honestly it first appeared in the Daily Worker. Then was picked-up by our media with all the eagerness of a victory in Viet Nam. All the while the Commies must have sat back and laughed at us—getting the knife in our own back and doing a little twisting.

Oh, I don't blame them for fighting that way—everything is fair in love and war—you know. They never lose a Russian or a Red Chinese and we run around flailing ourselves—and losing good Americans. I just blame our gullibility for falling for the ruse. I feel sorry for us, we should have gone on and won and the hell with world opinion. I realize bad things come out of wars. There never has been one where troops under the stress of battle did not commit acts they never would have committed under more favorable conditions of human understanding. But these have not been favorable conditions . . . Dammit, we are war—whether our striped-pants diplomats admit it or not.

In World War Two—I was a fighter pilot commander—I led hundreds of combat missions against an enemy—I killed a good many of them . . . in the air—in aircraft which were killing our allies down below and doing their best to kill me and my men. I killed more of the enemy on the ground—who were also trying to kill me and my men . . . Most likely I killed some women and children. I won't act tough and say such a thing was an honor and I am happy about it . . . I hope I have always been and still am a compassionate human being. But what I did under the circumstances of combat—I would do again and again—against an enemy of my Country—do it right now and never have any guilt complex or any remorse. Therefore—am I not just as much a murderer as either black Sergeant Donald Mitchell or white Lieutenant William Calley of Pinkville—Song My—My Lai? Or, as much as any other of those American military scapegoats who were sent out there to fight for us—and to whom it was: Kill or be Killed. And I mean that whether that enemy was male or female—old or young.

Here we stand with a self-assumed national guilt some of our leaders have told us to share—collectively. We are sort of urged to slash our wrists and pay penance—maybe hang ourselves as a nation—all the while brave men we let go out there and represent us—led to the block that WE may be expurgated for our national "crime". Why can't we see it for what it is—clever propaganda—and get so mad we would see the light and do something about that very real "mortal enemy" of ours. But, against our own soldiers. I feel sorry for us. The American Military Forces are under attack on so many various fronts that it is almost impossible to follow the machinations of a ruthless enemy. We can understand the foreign one—but the far more dangerous one here at nome defies our contemplations.

Good officers and men leave the Services in disgust and disappointment. Among us here at home disrespect for the Military has been encouraged. Sure, it is part of the enemy campaign but nevertheless do we have to promote it? It is a facet of the combat technique of the enemy. That enemy knew it could not defeat us by any stupid "Marquis of Queensbury Rules" as our foes had used in the past—more or less conventional with guns and bullets and bombs and trained men. So they found a way with propaganda and lies and treason. Hear this eye witness account of the way things have been in Viet Nam . . . things you most likely never heard or saw in any of our news media because they were not sensational enough.

Quotes by our sons—who were there: "We would take a village from the C.V.C. . . . there would be nothing but old men, women and children. . . Where were the young men? They were with the VC. . . . We would search the native hutches for weapons because we had been fired on from that village many times. Some of us had been wounded there and some of us killed. . . . Well, when the sergeant led some of the men into those huts—Claymore mines would go off . . . and they'd be blown up—my buddies and the sergeant. A little "old lady"—sitting on her hutch-step, was also sitting on some strings—which she tugged when she saw our men go into the right hut. Off would go the mine. Even innocent looking kids were used by the Cong. Any time you see a kid holding out his arms to hug you—grinning at you—begging for candy. Look out! The chances are he's carrying a bomb in a little old box—or a grenade. He's been taught by the V.C. to pull a string too—or the pin—soon as he has his arms around your neck—hugging you, or is well within your group of laughing G.I.'s All he wants to do is give the Yanks a surprise. Sure, the kid blows-up along with whoever your buddy was—but he doesn't know that—the Cong didn't tell him. This is one hell of a war!"

Back when I came home from my war—there in 1944, there was quite a different reception for me—; compared to the one handed out today. What the modern day Serviceman has to face astounds on old soldier like me. It is as though some "American Cong" was entrenched back here to bring about another kind of surrender of our Armed Forces. Peaceniks marching with Commie flags—signs that say "Freak the Army"—if they can't get to the G.I.—they sometimes get to his family. There's a defense fund raised to defend "servicemen" who refuse to participate in riot control training. By propaganda the G.I. is told over and over he cannot trust his own government. The anti-war congressmen and senators become more and more active and must be hearing the draft card burners loud and clear. There is no doubt in my mind that the Serviceman's worst enemy is right here at home—the one that has been at his back all while he was over here.

One more thing—during the last two years as I visited all those colleges and universities—elementary as well as high schools—I became convinced we need some of those things the press calls: moratoriums, all right. I agree with the National Commander of the American Legion—Milton Patrick says we desperately need a moratorium for the USA.

In this decade we have just entered we will observe the 200th Anniversary of our Country. That is—if we are around as a nation—to observe it. Which brings to mind that a former justice of the Supreme Court said: "history shows that the first evidence of each society's decay appeared in the toleration of disobedience of its laws".

Well, our nine Justices in those black robes have done a lot of changing of opinions since then—because we are doing a lot of "tolerating" and they are helping us do it. This decade could bring the death of America as we know it. You and I pray that it will not. We love this Country and we have always respected the military establishments and we revere all those who have fought for and given their lives for our freedoms. We know that our government is one of laws—not of men. We have been trying to live that way. We mean it when we pledge our allegiance to "One Nation Under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all" . . . The overwhelming majority of us, I am certain, feel pride in this America today—just as much as when I became a soldier in 1927 and when I came home from combat in 1945 . . .

Yet, just imagine a soldier back in World War Two, who we will say had gotten wounded in the head and had amnesia—had been in a sort of coma—ever since. A modern day Rip Van Winkle who had slept away this most productive quarter century—yet most tragic period too. Surely he would not recognize this place. Man—would he be confused trying to relate the glorious history and promise of that America he remembered! If he had to depend on what the Press tells him and after the TV got through to him for the first time—he'd know he had come-to in a strange land. What had become of that Constitution and that Declaration of Independence—given us by the vision and the sacrifices of our fore-fathers? Maybe we wanted them only if they cost us nothing?

This is the dangerous image I see us portraying as the current day USA—all over the world. And as it benefits nobody but the Communists—I am positive that they have planned it that way and have encouraged us in some way to advertise it with their propaganda. We sit and watch it as not only news—but as entertainment every day . . . much of it inflammatory, more of it trash . . . Some of it open and shut recipes for the lethargic public to make them wonder if they actually need a professional military anyway. . . . Are you laughing—then consider a comedy situation TV series by the title of Hogan's Heroes. Colonel Hogan looks every bit when he's made-up like the American Boy who used to live next door—before he left home and joined the Army Air Corps before Pearl Harbor. Long before any of these better than a hundred million—every other American, was born. Good looking, fun loving, debonaire Colonel Hogan represents (whether you believe it or not) the American military heirarchy; he along with his equally fun-loving airmen and sergeants and an RAF type or two. While blubberous bumbling Sergeant Schultz, of course buffons the kraut enemy. Then there is equally bumbling and stupid Colonel Klink—the prison commandant. So we are supposed to laugh at even the antics of the sinister black shirts in the SS . . . And we do. If we don't and write the TV network about miscarriages of fact and the rewriting of history—they reply in consternation that Hogan's Heroes is a fun series . . . they are sorry it did not make us feel good—do we have a sense of humor?

Well, now I do have such a thing and yet I don't even smile—much less laugh—when it is made to appear as documented fact that the Luftwaffe was as stupid as Klink or as happy-go-lucky and bumbling as Feldwebel Schultz. Not to mention, above all—that shot-down and captured American Obersts, pardon me, I mean Yankee Colonels like Hogan—had instant access to the German CO's office—and clandestinely led his men over or through the wire every other night into the neighboring Hun villages to have dates with blond beautiful frauleins. Or, as far as that goes—that our Americans who became prisoners of war in the various Stalag-lufts—kept right on fighting in their own way and contributed much towards the ultimate winning of the war—tactically and strategically. Slipping out at will, helping run the underground blowing up bridges, capturing and dispatching back home new Hitler secret weapons—and always having those love affairs with German Mata Haris—still having time and opportunity to befuddle the Wehrmacht generals, the Luftwaffe obersts and even the sadistic SS of Heinrick Himmler. Because, my friends that is rewriting history—I had friends who were shot down over Nazi Europe and made prisoners like Hogan and they were such for very serious years under that Third Reich. They did not have fun most of the time, they did not go out on the town for entertainment, they did not play games with tricking the camp commanders or his feldwebels, they did not plan and execute sabotage all over Germany to disrupt the war, they did not carry on radio communication with our Eighth and Ninth Air Forces back across the English Channel. Instead—a good many of them were tortured—some tried and condemned to death for escaping and plotting break-outs—a good many died. Sure, we come back to that weak explanation of the TV movie-makers: "It's only a fun piece—can't you laugh and forget war"? That is the sinister plot—laugh it all off—forget it! So many of us do laugh and not only forget—believe it. "By George, that must have been not so bad to be a prisoner back there in WWII . . . Why take Colonel Hogan, for instance—Man, that Robert Crane is a gas. Maybe some of those congressman and senators and moratorium kids are right after all—when they say we don't need so much high priced military—maybe we don't need any at all!"

Well, that's enough about TV movies—we could go on and on. . . . with the Wackiest Ship in the Army, Fail Safe, Seven Days in May, and Doctor Strangelove—look back at them and think. It is not that they are not well produced in Hollywood with top budgets and they hold one's attention . . . but they are misrepresentations of fact and produced with that sinister though subtle plan of casting doubt upon the integrity and the honor of your military establishment. You can never convince me they were not made with the approval of the soft on Communists groups—and as part of the overall World Plan of Communism . . . and it is no accident they teach fear and ridicule of the military establishment.

Another part of the image of America flashed on screens abroad too—promoted by our mortal enemies. Here at home they further strengthen a larger and larger element of our negative, defeatist society; that faint-hearted society of so-called Americans. This class of people is not new, they have always been with us—that almost 200 years we have been a nation. They were right there during the American Revolution—when they would have sacrified our independence and freedom for a quick settlement at some peace-table very similar to what came later at places like Panmunjom and Paris. George Washington knew them and said of them: "Their game is one more dangerous than efforts by arms!" In the past though, before television and its ease of teaching and distributing and undermining, our defeatists never had their way. They must not have it today.

So, back to that recommendation for a Moratorium for the U.S.A. . . . I urge you as Americans to become vitally concerned as citizens, get involved if it hurts—support an active moratorium with a mobilization of the Silent Majority—for America . . . We desperately need it against the blind and destructive criticism of our Nation's policy in Southeast Asia. We need peace in this world—but we need it through strength and honor. Primarily because that is the only way we are going to get it and keep it. It must be made absolutely clear to the world that the militant few teen-agers and middle aged lawyers who seem to think they are teen-agers—do not represent America any more than they depict a great generation . . . That there is a massive majority in this land that stands with this Country and with its leaders—who hate war but love liberty more.

The peaceniks scream at us that we have no business in Viet Nam. Yet, four successive presidents we elected—have determined with all the experience and brains at their beck and call—that we do have most urgent business there.

The business of stopping the tide of Communist aggression;

The business of honoring our words to brave allies;

The business of Peace, not war—no matter how much we have to sacrifice and fight to preserve that honorable peace.

The key to all this urgent business is an able, respected, honored professional military—in being. Refuse to take seriously the words of do-gooders, leftists, liberals—even communists, when they are handed hot and ready TV microphones with built-in audiences. Demand along with Vice President Agnew that facts be presented instead of distortion and bold biased views—. No matter how much the Chicago Seven and the like are permitted to be "news" to sell deodorants, tobacco and soap—take them for what they are; anarchists. They desecrated the sanctity of a court of law. They threatened and ridiculed and cursed a judge in the performance of his duty. But even if you are overly fair and believe ALL Americans should be heard, even if they advocate the overthrow of our government; then demand equal time for some of the real Americans who have been out there in YOUR uniforms—fighting for you. Hear the words of this one: one who placed his life on the line for you and me as well as for the Chicago Seven and Eldredge Cleaver and Rap Brown and the white SDS as well as Cassius Clay—offered his life for very low pay, not much security for his family and one in which he never was allowed to talk anywhere nearly so much as the radicals who curse this Nation today. . . . Major James Rowe finally managed to escape after five years a prisoner of the Viet Cong. And I will guarantee you it was pure hell amidst filth and destruction of dignity—and NOT even similar to what has been depicted over and over as the life of the glamorous, fun-loving, quick with a joke—Colonel Hogan and his "heroes" . . . Major Rowe testified that peace demonstrations back home helped break the spirit of Americans—already suffering as prisoners of war—and boosted the morale of the enemy. . . .

Yes, the Communist enemy has discovered the crack in our armor—in our honor. They are winning with words, we repeat for them over and over, a war they could never have won with bullets and bombs and fighting men. . . .

Oh, God! How could we have had the callousness to make our sons give up these comforts and pleasures and send them to foreign battlefields and refuse to back them all the way? Send them away as sacrifices—order them to stay there but not to fight to win—not even to kill an enemy Our highly trained military professional was denied the right to do much more than just be away from home and accept the risks for us. Perhaps even that could be understood. But then he does protect himself—as trained, and we bring him home within sight of all those blessings he gave up—we charge him with murder, destroy him far more effectively than his enemy ever could have. Are we not ashamed? Don't you imagine our sons would have rather come back home in that pathetic plastic bag? I would have.

ADDRESS OF HON. ROBERT B. MAUTZ

(Mr. PEPPER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, on January 23, 1970, the Honorable Robert B. Mautz, an esteemed educator and chancellor, State university system of Florida, delivered a notatable address on the modern role of the university, both public and private, and its challenge to be concerned not only with the transmission of knowledge but with an even more refined manifestation of intelligence, namely, the creation of knowledge. The speech was presented on the occasion of the board of trustees annual commencement luncheon which I had the privilege of attending.

Chancellor Mautz has been a practicing attorney in New York State, British West Africa, and Berlin, Germany. He served as professor of law and assistant dean, University of Florida, from 1950 through 1958; and dean of academic affairs, University of Florida, 1958–63. In 1963 he assumed the office of vice president of academic affairs at the university.

He is a contributor to the Encyclopedia International; a trustee and past president of the Florida Beta Students Aid Fund, Inc.; past president of the Florida Association of Colleges and Universities; and past president, academic vice presidents and deans, Southern Association of Colleges and Universities.

I commend this able address of Chancellor Mautz to my colleagues and my friends and countrymen, and include it in the RECORD immediately following my remarks:

REMARKS BY CHANCELLOR ROBERT B. MAUTZ, STATE UNIVERSITY SYSTEM OF FLORIDA AT THE BOARD OF TRUSTEES ANNUAL COMMENCEMENT LUNCHEON, UNIVERSITY OF MIAMI, JANUARY 23, 1970

One of the single greatest differences between man and other forms of life is man's ability to transmit knowledge. Knowledge is transmitted by other forms of life, but the methods of transmission are primitive and unsystematic. A mother bear will cuff her cubs into climbing a tree at the first approach of danger and thereby teach them something of self-preservation. Animals transmit information to each other, but their primitive and unsophisticated methods cannot compare with the logical systematic, and organized methods devised by man. The wonders of speech, the use of the printed word, and the mysteries of the computer are unique to man. Standing at the peak of this difference between man and other forms of life is the university.

Increasingly a university is concerned not only with the transmission of knowledge but with an even more refined manifestation of intelligence, namely, the creation of knowledge. Universities have changed from storehouses of old knowledge to their present role as generators of new knowledge which fuel our modern society. They have become essential not only to maintaining our society but to its continued growth and to our ability to improve the quality of our life in the face of an overwhelming increase in numbers. The universities' contributions are legion. One can begin with "A" for atomic energy and read through a list which includes the agricultural revolution that enables one family to feed almost eight others—to man's walking on the moon—to microwave ovens—to our improved health—to prepackaged foods—to the plastics which we wear—to this lighted, air-conditioned room to name but a few of the manifold ways in which universities have changed our lives.

The increase in knowledge has necessitated specialization. We have of necessity retreated into monasteries of mystery. In a very real sense our success has contributed to a great void and lack of understanding between the university world and the rest of society. The uniqueness of universities aggravates and exacerbates this lack of understanding. Let me examine just a few of the more obvious ways in which universities differ from the society around them. In the first place, one of the tasks of a university is to be a critic of the society which supports it. Frequently the function of this criticism is dissipated in the emotional fact that any criticism exists or in the impact of specific criticism. Sometimes critics point out facets of our society which we would rather ignore and pretend did not exist. Furthermore, the enormous prestige which settles upon a faculty member because of his expertise in his limited field of study carries over into his role as a citizen—a halo effect, if you will. The professor's role as an expert in some fields gives him totally unwarranted notoriety and attention in other fields in which he has no special qualifications but with respect to which he has a right to opinions as does any other citizen. Tragic examples come to mind such as the case of J. Robert Oppenheimer, a prominent theoretical physicist who treaded into the unfamiliar waters of politics. Another example in Linus Pauling who in his recent biological discoveries may very well have opened the path to elimination of many a man's illnesses and certain birth defects. His pronouncements in the areas of politics and economics are given added weight because of his success in his speciality, and we attribute a wisdom to such pronouncements which in fact contain no more than the wisdom possessed by ordinary citizens.

A second factor which inhibits our understanding of universities is our lack of ability to translate its accomplishments into the common measure of value of our society, namely, money. What is the value of a work of art, or a musical performance, or a book, or for that matter a scientific discovery. In a society which measures accomplishments by the price they can bring and which is attuned to the balance sheet, the goal of which is a profit, what standards can be brought to bear upon the contributions of a university? Today over fifty per cent of the power plants under construction or on the drawing boards will be nuclear powered.

But who would have been willing to assess a dollar value in 1930 to the simple formula $E=MC^2$. Or for that matter, who today can state the monetary value of Einstein's work. Who can predict the benefits to mankind coming from work now going on in quantum biology, the fundamental of which is an equation. Thus, in making the case to society for financial support, universities must deal in subjective judgments and appeal in a language out of tune with normal ways of measuring the value of societal effort. The coin which maintains universities is the coin of the realm, but the song heard in return by those who pay that coin is unfamiliar and not subject to judgment by normal standards.

The third problem which faces universities is that the material in which they deal is basically not of much interest to most of us. A study of anthropology may produce a history of a little known tribe. That history may have significant implications in tracing and understanding our culture, but it is only of slight interest to the average person. It is difficult to become as excited about antimatter as it is about I am Curious (Yellow) or as interested in lasers as in the winner of the Super Bowl. The painstaking research which occurs in a biology laboratory may ultimately aid in producing a cure for red tide, but presented in the dry language of chemistry, viruses, and ribonucleic acid it presents as much fascination as a car on a freeway. I came to Miami from a seminar on quantum theory at Sanibel Island. Nobel Laureates and learned discussors abounded. I confess that as much as I am a part of the university world I had trouble staying interested in the discussions. The audience for the grist of a university's daily mill is not extensive and is largely uncomprehending.

Finally, universities are expensive. They are principally service institutions, and hence a large portion of their budgets must go for salaries. The competition for talent is great, the market for faculty is national, and salaries must be competitive, which is a gentle way of saying that in the present market faculty salaries are high. If we are to compete for brains, the salaries must remain relatively high. But another important element of expense is increasingly pressing upon universities. Approximately one billion minutes have passed since the birth of Christ. If one took a thimble full of air and began to pour the molecules out of the thimble at a rate of a billion molecules per second, not per minute, and began pouring almost a quarter of a century before Columbus discovered America, the thimble would still be half full.

But universities no longer deal in particles as huge as molecules. They are really no longer concerned with those larger parts of a molecule known as atoms. They deal with the particles which make up an atom, with mesons, neutrons, and protons. Dealing with these infinitesimal particles requires eyes to see and instruments to measure that did not exist even in man's imagination a few decades past. Accelerators must be built at a cost of millions of dollars. Cyclotrons are a necessary part of the physicist's life, computers of his calculations. Perhaps the most dramatic example of the change in instrumentation is contained in the history of the microscope. Not more than half a century ago a $600 microscope would have delighted a scientist and even made of him a favored individual. Hanging on my office wall is a photograph of a virus. That virus attacks a cell, feeds upon and destroys that cell, and multiples itself fourteen times in a matter of ten seconds. If we understand the precise chemistry through which that virus extracts food from the cell and thereby reproduces by a factor of fourteen, we may have learned something significant about cancer and its causes and thereby have taken a giant stride towards its cure. The photograph was made with the help of an electronic miscroscope which magnified that virus 700,000 times. The microscope cost $300,000.

I take advantage of your time to plead with you for understanding of this unique and vital institution—a university. That understanding is essential to support, and that support is essential to our future well-being. It was Jean Jacques Servan-Schreiber who wrote in the American Challenge:

"Everyone admits that our lag in national education sterilizes much of our intellectual potential, that the inadequacy of professional training is one of the major causes of the rigidity of our industry, and that the poverty of our research threatens to make us an economic satellite."

He was writing of France, and he pointed out that the United States is the envy of the world. It has attained this state because of a combination of government, industry, and education which is unique in the history of mankind and which is responsible for the United States' great thrust forward in both the material and intellectual world.

I make the case for both public and private institutions. The two are complementary, and the richness and diversity the two systems provide are partially responsible for Jean Jacques Servan-Schreiber's envy. Universities must not be permitted to suffer the curse of mediocrity. We labor for our children and thereby labor for mankind. With all of its faults, higher education must have your support, sympathy, and understanding in order that it may correct those faults and assure the well-being of our successors.

CABINET MEMBERS SHOULD BE LAW-ABIDING

(Mr. HECHLER of West Virginia asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. HECHLER of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, President Nixon, in ordering troops to move the mail in the postal workers' strike, stated:

What is at issue then is the survival of a government based upon law.

It is in this spirit that I have joined with my colleagues, Hon. PHILLIP BURTON, Democrat, of California, and JAMES G. O'HARA, Democrat, of Michigan, as well as one of my own constituents, John Mendez of Chapmanville—a coal miner working for the Wheeling-Pittsburgh

Steel Corp. at the Stirrat, W. Va., mine—in filing suit against Secretary of the Interior Walter J. Hickel, and Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare Robert H. Finch. In an administration which professes an adherence to "law and order," these Members of the President's Cabinet have since March 2 been in violation of an explicit provision of the Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act.

In letters to Secretary Hickel on February 20 and March 5, 1970, I have pointed out the specific deadlines embodied in the act which the President signed on December 30, 1969. The most flagrant violation of the law concerns the failure of the two Cabinet officers to fulfill their obligation to publish in the Federal Register the manner in which coal dust samples shall be taken, in order to comply with the requirements to reduce the level of coal dust in the mines. Section 202(a) of the act states:

Each operator of a coal mine shall take accurate samples of the amount of respirable dust in the mine atmosphere to which each miner in the active workings of such mine is exposed. Such samples shall be taken by any device approved by the Secretary (of the Interior) and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare and in accordance with such methods, at such locations, at such intervals, and in such manner as the Secretaries shall prescribe in the Federal Register within sixty days from the date of enactment of this Act and from time to time thereafter.

Under the act, coal operators must bring the level of coal dust down to 3 milligrams of coal dust per cubic meter of air within 6 months of the passage of the law, and 2 milligrams within 3 years. Time extensions for compliance, with certain limitations, are allowed for operators who can demonstrate that they are unable immediately to comply.

Secretary Hickel has completely ignored my letters of February 20 and March 5. He has not even acknowledged them, much less answered them. I have made an informal check to insure that the letters were indeed delivered and are in the Department.

A week from today will be April 1—the date when the mandatory safety standards for coal mines go into effect. In the period since the passage of the act on December 30, 1969, the principal action of the administration has been the firing of Bureau of Mines Director John F. O'Leary and the firing of Henry Doyle, Assistant Director of the Bureau of Mines for Mineral Industries Health. I charge that these men were fired because of pressure by the coal industry, and because these men proved themselves to be dedicated to the enforcement of the law. An atmosphere of torpor has enveloped the Bureau of Mines. Down through the years, that Bureau has been production-oriented, rather than safety oriented. Jack O'Leary tried manfully to reverse the process, to bring objectivity and balance into enforcement, and for the first time to help provide protection for the coal miner without disrupting the industry. He got the ax for his efforts. The fact that he survived for nearly 14 months testifies to his superior professional ability. The Nixon administration needed him when the Coal Mine Safety Act was being debated in Congress, and now feels it can quietly shove him overboard.

The text of the court suit follows:

THE U.S. DISTRICT COURT, FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Ken Hechler, 917–5th Avenue, Huntington, West Virginia 25508; Phillip Burton, 845 Pine Street, San Francisco, California 94108; James O'Hara, Utica, Michigan; and John Mendez, 361–D Airport Road, Chapmanville, West Virginia 25712, Plaintiffs, against Walter J. Hickel, Secretary of the Interior, C Street between 18th & 19th Sts. N.W., Washington, D.C. 20240, and Robert H. Finch, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, 330 Independence Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20201, Defendants.

COMPLAINT FOR MANDATORY INJUNCTION TO COMPEL DEFENDANTS TO ISSUE REGULATIONS

1. This is an action against the Secretaries of the Interior and Health, Education, and Welfare to compel them to perform a ministerial duty imposed upon them by an Act of Congress, and to compel agency action, unlawfully withheld and unreasonably delayed. This Court has jurisdiction under the Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969, P.L. 91–173, 83 Stat. 742 (1970), 5 U.S.C. § 706(1) and 28 U.S.C. § 1361.

PLAINTIFFS

2. Plaintiffs Burton, Hechler and O'Hara are members of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States and were sponsors of the Bill which was enacted as the Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969, P.L. 91–173, 83 Stat. 742. Plaintiffs Burton and O'Hara are members of the House Education and Labor Committee which reported the Bill. Plaintiff Hechler represents a Congressional District in which many coal miners live. Plaintiff Mendez is a coal miner and member of the class that the Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969 was intended to benefit.

DEFENDANTS

3. Defendants are the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, on whom are imposed the duty of enforcing the Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969.

FIRST CAUSE OF ACTION

4. The Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act became law on December 30, 1969.

5. Section 202(a) of the Act provides that the defendants, within 60 days from the enactment of the Act, shall prescribe in the Federal Register the devices, methods, locations, intervals and manner in which operators of coal mines shall take accurate samples of the amount of respirable dust in the mine atmosphere to which miners, in the active workings of the mine, are exposed.

6. The 60-day period within which the regulations referred to in paragraph 5 of this Complaint were to have been prescribed and published in the Federal Register expired on Monday, March 2, 1970.

7. Defendants have failed to prescribe and publish the regulations as required by Section 202(a) of the Act with respect to methods, locations, intervals and manner of taking samples.

8. Defendant Hickel has failed and refused repeatedly to respond to inquiries from plaintiff Hechler respecting when, and whether, defendants will comply with and perform the duty imposed upon them by Section 202(a) of the Act.

9. Defendants' failure to perform the duty imposed upon them by the Act has the effect of thwarting the will of the Congress, of which plaintiffs O'Hara, Hechler and Burton are members, as expressed in an Act of Congress duly enacted and approved by the President of the United States; and will postpone beyond the period of time provided for by the Congress, the effectiveness of the provisions of Section 202 of the Act relating to permissible dust standards and required respiratory equipment in coal mines.

SECOND CAUSE OF ACTION

10. The failure of defendants to perform the duty imposed upon them by the Act will perpetuate and continue for plaintiff Mendez and all other coal miners, beyond the period of time provided by law, a danger to health and safety from excessive concentrations of coal dust in mine atmospheres that it was the intent and will of Congress to remove.

THE DUTY IMPOSED UPON DEFENDANTS IS MINISTERIAL

11. The duty imposed upon defendants by the Act to prescribe before March 2, 1970 methods, locations, intervals and manner for taking accurate samples of respirable dust in coal mines is ministerial and not discretionary insofar as Congress has provided a fixed period and a time certain for the issuance of such standards and regulations, whatever their content may be.

RELIEF REQUESTED

12. Plaintiffs pray that this Court issue an order in the nature of mandamus directing the defendants immediately and forthwith to prescribe and publish in the Federal Register the methods, locations, intervals and manner in which operators of coal mines shall take samples of the amount of respirable dust in the mine atmosphere to which each miner in the active workings of a mine is exposed;

13. Plaintiffs pray that the Court declare that defendants have failed to perform a duty owed to plaintiffs Burton, Hechler and O'Hara, and to all other members of the Congress of the United States, faithfully to execute and carry out the will of the Congress as expressed in the Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969;

14. Plaintiffs pray that the Court declare that the defendants have failed to perform a duty owed to plaintiff Mendez and all other coal miners, to act within the time limits established by law for the benefit and protection of plaintiff Mendez and all other coal miners.

WILLIAM A. DOBROVIR,
Attorney for Plaintiffs.

FEBRUARY 20, 1970.

Hon. WALTER J. HICKEL,
Secretary of the Interior,
Department of the Interior,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SECRETARY HICKEL: I am concerned with the Interior Department's new final regulation published in the Federal Register on February 18, 1970, (35 F.R. 3122) regarding applications for extension of time under section 303(r) of the Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969 (83 Stat. 742).

Why was not the new regulation published as proposed rule-making under the first sentence of section 301(d) of the Act, since there appears to be sufficient time to do so before Title III of the Act becomes operative?

A review of the definition set forth in the regulation of a "mechanized mining section" indicates that it is at variance with the definition of that term in the Senate Report on the legislation (see S. Rept. No. 91–411, p. 63) and the section-by-section analysis of the Act set forth in the Congressional Record on final passage of the Act in the Senate (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 115, pt. 29, p. 39990). I would appreciate your advising me why there is such a variance. I also would like to know what is excluded from the term "production equipment" by referring to a "conventional" or "continuous mining section."

The last paragraph of the regulation provides that the Bureau of Mines' district manager "will advise the operator of the conditions which must be met during the period of extension", but there is no reference made anywhere in the regulation to the rights of the miner in the affected mine.

The second sentence of section 301(d) of the Act provides:

"Before granting any exception to a mandatory safety standard as authorized by this title, the findings of the Secretary of his authorized representative shall be made public and shall be available to the representative of the miners at the affected coal mine." (Italic supplied.)

This provision is designed to protect the miners at a mine from the granting indiscriminately of exceptions from the mandatory safety standards of Title III of the Act. It also makes public such exceptions and avoids the often criticized procedure of carrying out a safety program without active participation by those most interested, namely the miner. The statement of the Managers of the House on the bill explains this provision as follows (H. Conf. Rept. 91–761, p. 78):

"3. The Senate bill provided that, where an exception to a standard is authorized, it can only be made when the criteria for the exception as set forth in the standard is met and upon a finding that granting the exception would not pose a danger to the safety of miners. There was no comparable House provision. The conference agreement adopted the approach of including this requirement in the appropriate provision of the title which permits exceptions rather than making it a general requirement, but, at the same time, requiring that, in granting any exception to a standard, the Secretary or his inspector must publish the reasons therefor and make them available to the miners at the mine before the exception is effective. If the miners believe that the granting of any exception will diminsh safety, their redress is to utilize the provisions of section 301(c)."

I would appreciate your promptly advising me (a) why there is no reference to section 301(d) of the Act in the new regulations, and (b) what steps you have taken to implement section 301(d) in connection with exceptions such as the one in this new regulation.

As you know, I am very much interested in insuring that this new Act will be implemented and administered vigorously and in a manner that will afford the greatest health and safety protection to the miner as is possible.

Sincerely,

KEN HECHLER.

MARCH 5, 1970.

Hon. WALTER J. HICKEL,
Secretary of the Interior, Department of the Interior, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SECRETARY HICKEL: Sixty-five days ago the landmark Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969 was signed into law by President Nixon after the Congress worked nearly ten months to draft the most comprehensive worker's health and safety Act of this nation. What has happened since then? Hardly anything for the good of the coal miner.

In less than one month, the Act will be in effect. Yet your department and the Health, Education, and Welfare Department have failed to meet any of the following time schedules listed in the Act:

1. Section 101(j)—All interpretations, regulations, and instructions in effect on enactment must be published, according to the House Conference Report "as soon as possible after enactment for information purposes and to consolidate them in one place. The managers view this requirement as a very minimal task for the Department to undertake and one that is quite important to both the operators and the miners."

2. Section 202(a).—Prescribe methods, locations, intervals, and manner of sampling respirable dust within 60 days after enactment.

3. Section 307(d)—Prescribe procedures and safeguards for making repairs on high-voltage lines within three months after enactment.

In addition to failing to meet these time schedules, a number of key positions in the Bureau of Mines have long gone unfilled and remain unfilled, except in an acting capacity, even today—just 27 days before the Act becomes effective. Some of these are:

1. Associate Director of Health and Safety—Mr. Henry Wheeler is filling this posision in an acting capacity. The position has been vacant for over a year.

2. Assistant Director for Mineral Industries Health—Mr. Henry Doyle is filling this position in an acting capacity, but I understand that he has submitted his resignation because your Department has not appointed him permanently to the position for over one year.

3. Assistant Director for Minerals Research—Mr. Carl Rampacek is filling this position in an acting capacity.

Now, over the last weekend the President abruptly and unceremoniously accepted the pro forma resignation of Mr. John F. O'Leary effective on Sunday, March 1, 1970—one month before the Act becomes effective, leaving the Bureau to be run, again in acting capacity, by Dr. Earl T. Hayes who has little or no experience or understanding of this new Act. Mr. O'Leary is a dedicated public servant who realized at the time of the tragedy in Farmington, West Virginia on November 20, 1968, that, while coal mining is a hazardous occupation, it can be made many times safer and healthier. His efforts in seeking workable, but strong, health and safety legislation will, in future years, be remembered by coal miners. Although I have not always agreed with him, I believe his performance overall for the coal miner was commendable.

In accepting Mr. O'Leary's resignation, your Department has rid itself of the only person with any real understanding or knowledge of this new Act. It will take time for new people, when finally appointed to these positions, to have even a modicum of this knowledge and understanding. This delay in leadership will inure to the benefit to those operators who continue, and there are still many, to oppose the legislation and resist its enforcement and to the detriment of the coal miners. It will be used as an excuse for lackadaisical enforcement—an excuse that the Congress, I am sure, will not tolerate.

Mr. Secretary, the Department's record since March, 1969, when President Nixon sent a proposed bill to Congress in this area has been equivocal, inept, and unresponsive, and it has generally exhibited, by its inaction, an unconcerned attitude for the coal miner. Even its rhetoric has been less than satisfying to the coal miner. Now the fate of the coal miner is left by the Department to the mercies of a leaderless Bureau of Mines that has a long history of floundering before the Farmington disaster. While I generally believe that no one is indispensable, I am convinced that the demise of Mr. O'Leary at this very crucial time is one instance where the falseness of this belief is unmistakably demonstrated.

I understand that, prior to his leaving office on March 1, Mr. O'Leary had approved a number of proposed health and safety regulations for publication in the Federal Register, including one on dust sampling. I would appreciate promptly receiving a copy of these proposed regulations. I would also appreciate a prompt response to my letter of February 20, 1970, regarding regulations published in the Federal Register under Section 303(r) of the Act.

Sincerely,

KEN HECHLER.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

THE VALUE OF A PROGRAM CALLED "A PRESIDENTIAL CLASSROOM FOR YOUNG AMERICANS"

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the many people who have given of their time and energy to make "a presidential classroom for young Americans" the success that it is.

The purpose of "a presidential classroom for young Americans" is to give American high school seniors an opportunity to study in the Nation's Capital, the intricacies of the United States Government; to enlighten these seniors by giving them the chance, through personal involvement and contact, to experience at firsthand what Government is doing in various fields; and to encourage dedication to and understanding of the American governmental system which all too often seems remote, bureaucratic and inaccessible to today's young people.

A teacher has said of this program:

The opportunity to see a practical application of our government at work, as provided by "a presidential classroom for young Americans", should give to a responsible segment of our young people a better foundation from which to make decisions to ensure a better society in the future; our student was most enthusiastic over the manners in which the various sessions were conducted, and he returned to us a much more enlightened young American.

Having seen these young Americans in Washington, I have been impressed with the spirit, the capabilities, the knowledge and the resourcefulness that high school students of today will bring in later life to the all-important job of improving our society.

With a more complete understanding of the problems and functions of government, these students are better equipped to help this Nation progress without the disrupting influence of misinformed and violent protest.

Perhaps the most effective way to articulate the value of the program is through the comments of an actual participant who, after a recent stay in the Nation's Capital, saw fit to make his views known to me. Mr. Speaker, I offer for the RECORD the following letter from a proud young American from my constituency, Mr. Donald Marchese of Bronx, N.Y.

MARCH 8, 1970.

Hon. MARIO BIAGGI,
Congress of the United States, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BIAGGI: As a senior high school student from Evander Childs in the Bronx, I was extremely proud to represent my school in a presidential classroom for young Americans. I believe the idea for such a program of study is extremely useful for today's politically minded youth. In my opinion, a presidential classroom taught me that our system's governmental structure may not be entirely fool-proof but, by far, it is the best known to exist in the world today. It reaffirmed my belief that if change is to come, it must come from within the established system, and that nothing can be accomplished by attempting to forcibly destroy it.

The set course of study, as established by Mrs. Margery Kraus, the curriculum director of a presidential classroom for young Americans, truly depicts the pulse of the people that make up the Nation's Government. The set course of study is composed of twenty-three seminars, in which we would hear speakers representing Washington's many governmental agencies. In addition to the planned course of study, the students are permitted to hold their own evening discussions on topics of their choice.

At any one time when you are exposed to three-hundred and fifty people from every State in our great Union you undoubtedly receive three-hundred and fifty different viewpoints on various topics. I can testify to the fact that, by having this opportunity to speak and listen to people from the far corners of the United States, I have since corrected some misapprehensions about American domestic and foreign policies, which I probably would have continued to vigorously defend.

I firmly believe that the dollars expended for this program of study should not be reduced. Instead, the program should be expanded to include longer stays in Washington for the Nation's youth and include a program by which a student could work for his Congressman in some capacity.

Furthermore, I firmly believe that such an expanded program of in-depth study, would also be beneficial to college students as well. If at any time there be a question as to the increase of monetarial appropriations to such a program as a presidential classroom for young Americans, let us not forget the words of President Hoover when he said, "A boy is a complete self-starter, and therefore wisdom in dealing with him consists most in what to do with him next. The priceless treasure of boyhood is his endless enthusiasm, his high store of idealism, his affection and his hopes. When we preserve these, we have made men, we have made citizens, and we have made Americans."

I want to thank you for making my brief stay in Washington so pleasant and enlightening. I shall long remember it. My thanks again.

Sincerely,

DONALD MARCHESE.

THE BUFFALO AND THE IRON HORSE

HON. HOWARD W. ROBISON

OF NEW YORK

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. ROBISON. Mr. Speaker, in my continuing search for solutions to and comments on the state of our Nation's railroad passenger service, I came across an excellent comment thereon in the March 12 New York Times. Columnist Tom Wicker points out most emphatically that what is needed is a national transportation system. I could not agree more for this is what I have been urging as policy. We know what is needed, so let us do it.

Mr. Wicker's fine column follows:

THE BUFFALO AND THE IRON HORSE

(By Tom Wicker)

Now that the Penn Central has asked to abandon passenger service in what is almost the heart of America—the area between Chicago and Harrisburg—the scheme the railroads have been pushing for decades is nearing completion. With the collusion of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is supposed to protect the interests of the public, railroad passenger service has been all but sacrificed to profits.

This is not because passenger trains are inherently unprofitable in the era of the jet plane and the superhighway, or because there is no railroad riding public to be cultivated and served. It is because the railroads sought to make maximum profits by concentrating on freight-hauling and defaulting their obligations as passenger carriers.

CATALOGUE OF HORRORS

At least since World War II, therefore, most lines have been deliberately discouraging passenger traffic through poor service, ill-kept schedules, filthy trains, insolent crewmen, archaic ticketing and reservations systems, outmoded station facilities, ancient rolling stock and the steadily declining frequency and availability of trains even between major cities. To this catalogue of public horrors, the railroads added outrageously contrived financial "losses" on passenger trains for the sympathetic consideration of the I.C.C.

An article in this newspaper by Christopher Lydon has detailed how accounting gimmickry made it appear that passenger trains had been losing huge sums since 1945—when in fact passenger traffic was profitable, despite the decline in service, at least until the early sixties, and in the East until 1966. It was, of course, on the basis of the hoked-up figures that the I.C.C. permitted the discontinuance of so many trains in the fifties and sixties.

THE SUBSIDY ISSUE

And while it is true that throughout this period the Government in one way or another was heavily subsidizing air and highway travel, Mr. Lydon pointed out that it was the railroads themselves that took the lead in asking the Government to discontinue a major form of passenger-train revenue—Federal payments for carrying the mail.

Thus the railroads' disinterest in serving passengers, the complaisance of the I.C.C. and the lack of a coherent Federal transportation policy have combined to deprive the American public of what citizens of every other Western industrial nation take for granted—adequate railroad service. And this has happened at a time when the automobile has become the worst polluter of the air, when airports and the air traffic lanes around important centers are dangerously overcrowded, when technology is exploding, and when the American people are the richest in history.

The Penn Central's Metroliner has proved between New York and Washington the need for and the potential of convenient, comfortable, fast rail service in metropolitan corridors, of which there are many. The Seaboard Coast Line's Florida Special on the New York-Miami run demonstrates every winter that there is still a demand and need for first-rate long-haul service over particular routes.

But the California Zephyr, which runs through some of the most spectacular scenery anywhere in the world, is apparently to be abandoned. Like so many other things of value in America, its worth is not recognized by a careless people tragically exploited by those designated to serve them and to protect their interests. Properly operated and offered to the public, the route of the Zephyr should be a priceless asset to American tourism, to say nothing of American transportation.

The problem is not just to retain the spavined bones of an ancient and staggering passenger network as a sort of curiosity, like the few buffalo one can now see penned sadly in corners of the great range which once roamed in their vast and splendid herds. What is needed is a national transportation system, providing safe and speedy airservice everywhere needed, maintaining the great interstate highway grid, extending into similar corridors the kind of fast intercity service the Metroliner provides, maintaining and improving a serviceable minimum of long-haul rail routes to supplement air and auto travel and tourism.

A LAST-GASP BILL

That kind of integrated national transportion network is beyond the scope of a last-gasp bill that the Senate Commerce Committee is developing. But that measure would at least preserve, like buffalo, a last few passenger trains, placing them beyond the power of the railroads to subvert, providing some operating and equipment subsidies, and keeping alive the dim hope of better, safer, more convenient travel in America.

PRESIDENTIAL APPOINTMENTS

OF TEXAS

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. BUSH. Mr. Speaker, 3 years ago in a book review for the Harvard Law Review, Charles Alan Wright, one of our finest constitutional specialists, took issue with those who believe that Federal judges should not be appointed on a political basis. His argument is as follows:

We have come to accept the fact that judges in general, and federal judges in particular, are required to pass upon public issues of the most sensitive sort. I would think a President derelict in his duty, and unfaithful to democratic theory, if we did not endeavor to appoint to the bench men whose sets of values with regard to such issues were similar to his own. He is more likely to find such men among his political friends than among his political opponents.

The propriety of the Senate applying an ideological test to Presidential appointments is at issue in connection with the Carswell nomination.

I believe very strongly that the system would be seriously compromised if Presidential appointments are rejected when a majority of the Senate is of the opposite party or of a different ideology from the President.

The confirmation of Judge Carswell is not within the jurisdiction of the House of Representatives. However, knowing of Charles Alan Wright's reputation, I thought his comments might be of interest to our colleagues in the other body.

URBAN AMERICA—PROBLEMS AND PROSPECTS

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, Americans welcome the emphasis which has belatedly come to rest on our environment—the air, the water, and the land. We must insist, however, that all this talk does not come to pass without action and we must insist—that this concern for environment does not exclude the vital consideration for human resources and existences.

Here is where real waste can be observed and where we can least afford it. Our urban environment is being suffocated not only by smog—but by the carelessness of man which breeds the filth of ghettos, the sickness of hunger, and the cycle of poverty.

It is difficult to reach for optimism in the midst of the crises which now exist, but Howard T. Robinson, who currently serves as labor attaché in the American Embassy, Tokyo, Japan, sees hope. Mr. Robinson, during his recent fellowship at the Center for Advanced Studies, Wesleyan University, documented a course for action in urban America. Mr. Robinson's reasoning and subsequent recommendations are worthy of note.

For the attention of my colleagues who share my interest, I submit the following paper, "Urban America: Its Problems and Prospects," by Howard T. Robinson.

URBAN AMERICA: ITS PROBLEMS AND PROSPECTS

Since September of last year and due to my good fortune of having an opportunity to accept a fellowship at Wesleyan University's Center for Advanced Studies, I have turned my thoughts from foreign affairs to that of our domestic problems. The problem which is the most pressing is that of our urban community.

I shy away from the common term, "urban crisis". Perhaps reflecting my optimistic nature, or perhaps the nature of the problem, I prefer the word "challenge". "Challenge" is a more adequate metaphor and a better indication of the considerations required to solve these problems. Crisis implies too little, too fast. I venture to say that the solutions will arise when we find a way to commit our maximum resources to domestic problems, while at the same time continuing to protect our world-wide interest. I do not suppose, nor do I suspect you do, that our domestic problems can be totally separated from our international interest, for it is only natural that other nations will make their judgments about us on the basis of our strengths and weaknesses both at home and abroad. Our domestic problems, therefore, affect the way in which other nations see and feel about us. Though wanting to make this point, it is not my purpose in this paper to examine the international impact of our domestic troubles but instead to focus on the governmental and racial aspects of our cities. And perhaps, if you are still with me, to discuss the conflicting priorities which we must face if we are to successfully confront these particular problems.

Mr. John Gardner, President of the National Urban Coalition, says, "that human institutions require periodic redesign (if only because of their tendency to decay)".[1] Our cities are a vivid example of this decay. To confirm it we need only examine their historical neglect as they grew from small villages into towns and finally into the crowded and paradoxical edifices of technological, cultural, and social change. The city and the adjoining urban community represent over 70 percent of our population today—and it is the city that houses our major business and financial institutions, our theaters, libraries, zoos, and a score of other cultural gains. It is also the city that most widely and vividly reflects losses. The city is, and quite rightly ought to be, the showcase of both our failures and accomplishments, for like it or not, urban America is what we as a nation have become. We are no longer a rural-urban society—we are urban!!! And probably our greatest domestic problem is therefore urban decay.

There are many reasons for the decay and many obstacles to solution. One is our past failure to plan, a failure that has left us in many places with such a shambles of streets and bricks and crowding as to render absurd the kind of neatly packed immediate solutions that are currently in such demand. Nor can the blame for this lack of planning be justly placed on any one group of persons. Blaming get us nowhere in any case, since the real point is that we face what philosopher William Ledbetter tells us, "we're all sailing in the same boat, brother. You can't shake one end without you shake the other."

So neither can we find a lasting solution in the super-charged rhetoric now in use. The blacks cannot get out of the ghetto and whites cannot get away, no matter how they run. Yet current rhetoric about our urban community, focusing as it does on a "we-they" kind of analysis, misses this point, when in fact some, or even perhaps indeed our major, urban problems would probably have been with us even if there had been no "theys" to contend with.

A basic reason for our failure to plan is our concept of individual freedom, a belief which obviously restricts the government's ability to plan. Even our most militant critics, in spite of the fact that they seek immediate cures for our urban ills, demand that maximum individual freedom be continued and expanded. A further obstacle to lasting solutions is that our most intelligent young people seeking government careers are not attracted to local government service. They want national exposure. Therefore, there are few among us with adequate in-depth knowledge of and concern for county government. And even fewer know how county, State, and Federal government relate to and compete with city government for its share of the local tax dollar and federal fund transfers. Yet, the need for people of such knowledge is great, because the ability of local government to provide comprehensive service is perhaps the most important avenue toward solving our current urban problems. This is true despite the fact that under present conditions the bureaucracies of these local governments feel forced to spend most of their time protecting their autonomy.

The many overlapping responsibilities between State, city, and county governments are a further obstacle to progress. In some instances, a city government will not have responsibility for the education and social welfare needs of its population. In others, certain taxes and areas of law-enforcement are matters left to the county, what splitting of responsibility means, of course, is that citizens are confused as to where to seek needed services—city hall, the state house, or Washington.

I want to emphasize the importance of local government despite the fact that it is intricate in its layering, overly self-protective and currently weak on services to its population. To improve local government, we must strengthen our local political base of citizen participation, not lessen or eliminate it. Again permit me to quote Mr. John Gardner. "In order to have a vital society, we must have as high a degree of participation by the individual as we can manage." With this I agree. It is only in citizen participation that we can find the power-source which can bring into being a more effective and concerned local government. We and our neighbors can contribute to a solution of our own problems, if only we are sufficiently motivated, and would evidence genuine respect for the rights of all our neighbors, black, white, rich, or poor.

Since our cities were largely products of individualism, they failed to take account of all of these rights. They were built by individuals and groups of men who made a profit from their efforts. Once these buildings and roads were completed, they had to be serviced. So local governments were chartered, and obviously needed money. Individual taxations were unpopular and still are, but taxation on commerce and property were acceptable partly because of the politicians' power and partly because the men who built the buildings and roads were willing to be taxed for services directly relevant to their interests such as sanitation, water, power, and transportation. But health, education, and social welfare did not seem directly related to their interests and hence were not top priorities for them then and still suffer from lack of priority now. A good portion of social welfare cost is still derived from private donation—such things as teachers' salaries, school buildings, and updated teaching materials also still suffer as well from the same lack of priority. Welfare and education, important as they are, are only part of the low priority problem. Another major part is poverty.

On this important item the history of poverty legislation is of significant interest. It did not generate from the masses of the poor in our cities. In a political sense, poverty was discovered in the 1950's in the "depressed" areas and/or regions of high unemployment. It was not considered and urban problem or a black problem per se. Kenneth B. Clark states that the "problems of poverty and social change were not identified as racial (even) in the early 1960's as the anti-poverty program got underway." He notes that "the Appalachian region of West Virginia, rather than northern ghettos, served to symbolize poverty in the 1960 presidential primary race and election campaign." And that "it was only after the anti-poverty program focused on the problem of the urban Negro that the words "Negro" and poor came to seem synonymous," and that this has been "to the detriment of the white and black alike." For "as a result," he says, "the white poor often refused to participate in such programs, particularly in the northern cities, and antipoverty and community action projects in many urban areas became almost exclusively Negro."[2]

The point I wish to press upon you is that only as poverty is realized as a national challenge, and not exclusively an urban or racial one, can we handle it properly even as an urban problem. Once we appreciate this, it is possible, I believe, for us to see our urban centers as reflections of what we have become and not what one or the other group within our society has caused.

A second important aspect of the poverty problem is that while urban problems exist in all developed countries, and give rise to youth disaffection throughout the world, it is only in our Nation, the richest of them all, that we have the large scale relative poverty that is the cause of so much disaffection, as the gap between the rich and the poor continues to widen, more and more people are caught up into the poor and near-poor category: the near poor are perhaps the worst off, for they live on the fringe of social ostracism. I could go on talking about the poor and near poor: indeed I could do so from personal experiences, but as you see, I'm about to stray from my main topic, the cities, in which poverty is only one factor, albeit, a very important one.

So to return directly to urban problems—the vital point is how we think of our cities and the institutions that go into their make-up. Unfortunately, many of those who were responsible for building our cities only use them today for limited entertainment and commercial purposes. And what is worse, in spite of the fact that they gain their income from the cities, they show little interest in their improvement. And this has left a vacuum for the influx of new people, which the city could not have done without, seeking a better way of life via improved job opportunities. These people had neither power, nor money, nor urban education when they came. We did little or nothing to help them help themselves or contribute to community well-being. We merely treated the new arrivals as temporary labor. But today due to technilogical advancement we need a new kind of labor force, and it must have training. As Peter R. Drucker[3] explains, between 1850 and 1870 "the center of economic gravity shifted from the industries of the industrial revolution . . . to new and different industries . . . and that . . . Now, a hundred years later: we are in the early stages of a similar and equally drastic shift. . . ." This new shift, he says, will demand a different work force. The demand, he explains, will be for "knowledge workers rather than manual workers". This fact poses perhaps our greatest educational challenge: How to develop the human resource for the age in which we live, for both personal and social well-being. As Mr. Drucker further tells us, "the transfer of marginal farmers and farm workers to urban employment has by itself probably been the largest single factor in the rise of (our) national productivity". This being true, there is every justification that public assistance and higher education as a right ought to be provided the urban poor because they have earned it; and if they have not, it is not altogether their fault. We must keep in mind that it is the success of our technological age which provides us our new luxury and at the same time has forced millions of our fellow citizens from jobs they themselves thought to be secure. Many of these were black.

Let me amplify on the consequences of our failure to help these people as we should have, especially the Blacks. Between the years 1940 and 1966 an excess of 3.7 million nonwhites fled the south seeking their promised land in the north. Once they arrived, they needed housing and jobs. But due largely to discrimination, neither were available to the degree expected. Beyond that, the new arrival did not possess marketable skills usable in the urban context; and this was true for white workers as well. But for the Blacks there were few schools or other public services available for acquisition of marketable skills. Even if there had been, job discrimination would have still prohibited their ability to become employed. Apprenticeship programs were closed to Blacks.

Their housing had to be shared with their previously arrived uncles, cousins, or brothers. This spawned unsanitary conditions, overcrowding of available houses, schools, and other public facilities, thus creating a ghetto of that badly needed but unwanted human resource. The rise of ghettos created with it the social phenomena of school segregation, inferior education, joblessness, and crime. Much of this was not unlike the conditions that existed with previous ghetto dwellers (the Irish, Italians, Poles, etc.). The real difference was that the new poor were mostly Black, not able to assimilate: A change of name or religion could not change a skin color.

PRIORITIES

Lisle Carter[4] former assistant secretary of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare and vice president of the Urban Coalition recently said that "we have, in fact, two kinds of communities . . . This conflict", he said, "between the city and the suburbs is a real one. We talk of air and water pollution, mass transit, freeways, ending traffic congestion. We talk of conservation", he went on, "and preservation of open space and so forth: these are all urban problems of a kind, and they are all important urban problems. But they represent the priorities of a society that has solved most of its economic and social problems, that has jobs, that has good schools and health care and good housing". Mr. Carter says "these are, in fact, the priorities of the great middle-class suburbia that is America. In contrast, he said, "The society of the inner city has different values: not that it doesn't also approve of clean air and clean water, freeways and the like. But this inner city society has to give priorities to economic and social goals (which) suburban America now take for granted".

Mr. Carter's analysis gives us focus. A focus in which every level of our society must direct its attention: The Federal Government, the Congress, the State Legislature, and the City Council. The question is where shall we place our priorities for the expending of public monies? The suburbs cry for "Law and Order". The inner city cries for social justice under the law: We want jobs and better schools . . . We want social welfare as a right and with dignity. The suburbs echo that social welfare restricts individual initiatives and are give-aways, i.e., the poor are lazy. On and on the debate . . . and it can continue, unless we—you and I—take responsibility for facing this challenge. You and I, the individuals, can alter these priorities by our participation, if we are motivated and have the will to do so . . . This is an area in which our youth can constructively make a contribution: A far more immediate and effective contribution than in national politics. Not that I wish to suggest that national politics are unimportant in dealing with urban problems. That would be untrue, but it is true that a strong and determined local government can have reasonable quick effect on members of Congress and federal executives. The power for change is at City Hall and the County Seat, because this is where the voters live and work.

PROSPECTS

I will now turn my thoughts to a more detailed discussion of the prospects for solutions for the problems already outlined. There are of course no precise and clear answers. After a frustrating search for more precise answers to present in this paper, I came across an article in The New York Times which came to my rescue. The article was headlined (March 24, 1969, on page 29): "Private organizations try to come to grips with causes of urban crisis and potential remedies". One of the points the article makes is that "Even if . . . A way is found to combat white racism, the private urbanologists believe only a fraction of the problem would be solved . . . the difficulty is not so much 'conscious racism' as civic indifference and selfishness, and the universal tendency to cling to business as usual". (This is true of all races.) It is therefore a challenge confronting all of us, not just the problem of the poor, the blacks, and the unorganized. But how can we best work together? And together we must come.

Edward Sylvester, a former director of the Federal Government's office of contractual complaints and later assistant secretary of H.E.W., has one important suggestion.[5] Speaking on the "emerging role of the poor, the blacks, and the unorganized", he said that . . . "the poor, the blacks and the unorganized are really in fact the ultimate clients" (of our institutions). But Mr. Sylvester says that ". . . on close analysis we'll find that just as often as not their interests are really not parallel (with the constituency) of the organized institutions. For example, he said that "our institutions . . . do . . . serve the majority of the people of this country in a very effective way." It is, therefore, the poor, the blacks and the unorganized that suffer because of their lack of organizational ties. These are the people of our inner city.

Consequently, I believe we ought to encourage the poor, the blacks and the unorganized to become active participants in our political organizations. I think we could effect such a plan, if we used our patronage system properly. In this way we could stimulate people to participate more fully in the political process. I am convinced that if the citizen knew and had faith in his ability to affect his own life in this way, he would do so. The old patronage system did provide many with hope. But unfortunately we failed to modernize and make the system of patronage work toward wider citizen participation. I do not think that corruption caused the demise of political patronage. It was, rather, our failure to see in it a source of institutional strength that led to its decay. The prospect of a revival of local political interest seems to me quite possible, if we follow the concepts laid down in O.E.O. legislation: i.e., maximum feasible local participation. I think we are clearly moving in this direction and I suggest that we begin to see that if we are to strengthen local Government we must increase the level of participation.

A second point of attack is on rural poverty, an attack already mounted. The March 1st AFL–CIO News carried an article, "rural aid programs called vital to cities". The article reports that the federation proposes to Congress that a ceiling ought to be placed on Federal income maintenance benefits paid to each farm, and that measures to help farmers bargain collectively for reasonable prices for their products be legislated. The AFL–CIO also proposed that farm workers be covered under the National Labor Relations Acts, minimum wage law, State unemployment, and workmen's compensation laws, and other minimum Federal welfare standards. The AFL–CIO, to justify these proposals, cite that the one-fourth of the nation's total population that remains in rural America contains one-half of all the poor. This attack is of basic importance, because if we wish to dissuade people from further congesting our cities they must have opportunities of a national standard, including wages and social benefits, even if they are still living in rural America.

A third point of attack is to break the vicious circle of the social welfare, jobs and education, the unorganized poor and the blacks are caught in. One needs welfare to survive without a job . . . in today's technological society one needs education to obtain a meaningful job. To obtain an education, if you are a mature adult, you must have an income. If you are a family man, you must have a secured income, not only while attending school, but also for a period between training and employment. To ask our society to pay for this preparation of our citizens for economic and social independence is not a "hand-out". It is sheer social justice and social health.

We are living in a new world, one in which public responsibility of citizens is not merely desirable but required, if we are to retain a sense of social justice and health. The prospect for preparing people for a productive life and good citizenship seems to me fairly good, and we can afford it. But will we react in time? When one sees that states like Rhode Island have begun to couple the factors of jobs, social welfare, and education together to benefit our citizens it stimulates optimism. So has our Manpower Act. But unfortunately too much of the training is concerned with job skills that will too soon become obsolete by technological advancement. There is no need to train a person to be a welder if the likelihood is that the job will soon be done by automation. What is needed is to train drop-outs in such a way as to permit them to attend college. In other words, give him credit for his vocational training and life experience toward a college degree, i.e., engineering if he is mechanically inclined, or business if his experience and previous training are along this line. And finally, why not have continuous public education?

The prospects for this kind of program seem good. OEO seems clearly to be moving in this direction. But our institutions of higher learning must be willing to accept these potential students.

In conclusion, whatever we do requires institutional flexibility. The thoughts I have expressed, tonight, are those of hope and optimism. An optimism regarding challenges to a people who have met them before . . . although we are forced to admit that previous confrontations have not demanded so much of the individual. The demand is clear and urgent. In order to preserve the viability of our institutions that make up our cities, we as individuals must make them flexible enough, and do it now, do it in time to ward off unwarranted suppressive action. We cannot do it all, let alone in time, except by maximum personal participation in all sectors of our community.

And not the least of these is local politics, our urban centers call out today for you and me to give of ourselves in local politics, in education, in home building, in establishing the right social priorities. More importantly, the call is for a sincere sense of brotherhood and a demonstration of citizen pride—black, white, rich and poor.

We as citizens have a nation to advance. We must engage our minds and our energies in finding direction and constructive solutions to all our problems. The time when we could blame a particular group of our citizens for these ills has long passed us by.

Footnotes at end of article.

But basic to it all is the abolition of racism and the establishment of integration. Our failure to deal swiftly and effectively with our racial problems has brought down upon us a broad sense of distrust from our young people. The young blacks, unlike blacks of previous generations, have little faith in integration as a goal. But yet, we all know that by finding a solution to the problem of integration, we will free ourselves to tackle the other major institutional problems. So long as we fail to face squarely and remove the cancer of racialism . . . we will only delay our ability to establish the meaningful priorities—much less providing solutions. There are those who would refuse to be flexible and there are those, black and white, who believe that the only solution to our racial problems is separation. Black people must not be fooled by this easy way to temporary satisfaction and long range frustration. The black man's stake is in a solution to overall problems. His stake is not in racialism. His stake is in making America live up to the promises of democracy, and in being proud of his heritage—an agent and not a victim of power.

Our cities, populated as they are with people of all races, offer us a unique opportunity to meet this basic challenge. Why is it we are so slow in realizing this opportunity? It is hard to say because given the very close proximity of our citizens within the urban centers, we have a better opportunity to educate them to live, work, and play as one. It is therefore central to the solution of the urban challenge that we find a method for neighborhood improvement instead of neighborhood destruction. The destruction of buildings within center city neighborhoods displaces people and disrupts the economic flow of the neighborhood. Additionally, these empty lots become eyesores and dangerous playgrounds for children. The challenge is to find ways of utilizing our educational institutions in a manner that will provide relevant education to meet these needs and permit all our local citizens an opportunity to make continuous use of these facilities to improve their income, their social status, and their environment.

In doing this we cannot overlook the problem of sociological and psychological employment and unemployment. The poor, the black men, and women dislike the stigma we associate with them if they are employed in menial tasks. We need to have the functions performed but we must provide a decent wage level for them and learn to classify these jobs so as to meet social standards. They dislike the stigma our society has given the broom and the shovel. These people desperately need and desire jobs from which they can gain income and social dignity and we can provide it. Let us not forget how social stigma caused by servile employment can lead to unfortunate types of behavior, including crime.

Our educational institutions can be helpful in overcoming these psychological problems relative to employment. We ought to gear our education institutions to take the lead in doing so. Perhaps the best agency for this is the community college as has been suggested by Dr. Clark Kerr.[6] Dr. Kerr notes that "the campus may approach the cities in several ways . . . location in the city . . . adult education . . . provide centers for cultural programs, to act as a base for community renewal". But he also rightly warns us that "the city is not a single interest . . ." rather, he says, it is full of tensions and conflicts, and campus involvement with the city carries implications for involvement in local politics". The danger of students and faculty members becoming involved in local politics at cross purposes with local political leaders must be guarded against. And this can be done through having the college become more relevant to the practical aspects of the local community, not by trying to direct the community's actions. I am optimistic that we will meet this challenge and that we can establish the right priorities for accomplishing our broad social needs and at the same rebuild the cities. But again I must emphasize the basic pre-conditions: The need for individual participation and overcoming racism. Failure to deal with these questions will be, in the long run, more harmful than failure to rebuild the dilapidated buildings, because we cannot have a healthy city if we do not have maximum citizen participation and full fledged integration. The burden of long term solution lies in both the quantity and quality of our personal participation.

DURHAM, N.C., VA HOSPITAL LACKS FUNDS AND PERSONNEL, REACHING CRIPPLING PROPORTIONS ACCORDING TO THE HOSPITAL'S CHIEF RESIDENT PHYSICIAN

HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE

OF TEXAS

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Veterans Affairs has been in the process of conducting a comprehensive investigation in to the operations of the VA medical care program because we had received reports from many sources that many sick and disabled patients in VA hospitals were receiving inadequate care.

Mr. Speaker, our preliminary investigation of this serious problem is being brought to a conclusion and we expect to make a final determination of the overall dimension of this problem throughout the 166 VA hospital system so that enough additional funding will be added to the 1971 VA budget to help correct many of the deficiencies which we have found in the VA medical program.

We have recently received letters and telegrams from VA hospital employees indicating that the lack of funds is seriously handicapping hospital operations to the point of crippling proportions. Typical of these communications is one recently received from Dr. David L. Brewer, chief medical resident at the Durham, N.C., VA hospital, which follows:

DURHAM, N.C.,
March 3, 1970.

Hon. OLIN E. TEAGUE,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. TEAGUE: We would like to bring to your attention some problems in the V.A. Hospitals which directly effect the quality of medical care available for veterans. The lack of necessary finances has been a problem for years, but recently it has reached crippling proportions. The Durham V.A. Hospital is one of the busiest hospitals in the V.A. system and delivers a high quality of medical care, largely due to its close affiliation with Duke University Medical Center. In spite of this, we are severely handicapped because of lack of adequate personnel and finances. There is no doubt that patients suffer because of this.

Some of the more pressing problems are listed below:

(1) Wards of 41 patients, many of whom are quite ill, are staffed by one nurse on two of the three shifts daily. We are unable to have personnel ceilings raised or have budgetary support for additional urgently needed nurses.

(2) Nursing procedures cannot be done by these few hard working nurses and, as a result, vital signs are not recorded as often as ordered by the physicians; some patients are seen only once during an 8 hour shift by the nurse; patients' call lights may go 15–20 minutes before they are answered; and patients do not receive the necessary bathing, help with eating, and other nursing procedures. Physicians in the hospital find themselves doing nursing duties on seriously ill patients because they would not be done otherwise.

(3) In spite of a long waiting list of patients to be admitted and large numbers of applicants for admission (averaging approximately 100 per day), we have beds which are closed because there are no nurses available to care for these areas.

(4) Our laboratories, which perform excellent work during the day, are so poorly supplied with personnel that emergency laboratory tests at night have 2–5 hour delays and are often inaccurate and unreliable because untrained personnel are all we can afford to hire at night. Patients are sick around the clock and with increasing medical sophistication emergency laboratory determinations must be done promptly and accurately for adequate patient care.

(5) In spite of a national crisis in medical care because of a lack of well-trained physicians the V.A. has now cut the amount of money available to pay residents and interns in training by 10 per cent. This means that rather than increasing post-graduate training for physicians, the number who will be trained is less.

(6) The building is unsanitary and poorly cleaned because enough personnel cannot be hired for adequate housekeeping. This certainly is not the sort of cleanliness one would expect in a hospital.

(7) Patients must wait several days for x-rays at times because we are unable to hire enough x-ray technicians to keep up with the demands. In the long run this prolongs hospitalizations and increases overall costs.

(8) In spite of the V.A. having a program for placement of convalescent veterans in contract nursing homes there is no money available to provide this service. As a result, our beds in acute hospitals become jammed with chronically ill patients who would be more economically cared for in nursing homes. Patients who are acutely ill may not be admitted because no beds are available. (Our Medical Service runs at 98 per cent bed occupancy.)

(9) There is frequently no money to afford certain specialized laboratory tests which are needed for diagnosis.

(10) Renovation of certain existing facilities are badly needed. Many wards lack such simple equipment as high-low beds and sick patients have to crawl up to lie down. Simple renovation could create offices for students and physicians where presently there are virtually none.

There is little doubt that these problems seriously impair our ability to deliver the high quality health care that is available today. It is evident that the primary problem that is responsible for this less than optimal health care is lack of financial support for the V.A. Hospitals. Our own hospital administrators appear to be doing their best with the limitation of funds.

Thank you for your interest in these problems. Those of us in the "field" share your concern for the welfare of these hospitals and patients.

Sincerely yours,

DAVID L. BREWER, M.D.,
Chief Medical Resident.

CHIROPRACTIC SHOULD BE INCLUDED

HON. AL ULLMAN

OF OREGON

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Ways and Means has before it my bill, H.R. 14512, which would amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to include chiropractic services. This bill limits chiropractic coverage, not only to those functions authorized by State law, but to diagnosis and treatment of neural, muscular, and skeletal conditions.

Throughout consideration of the medicare authorization and subsequent amendments to the program I have been committed to the principle of freedom of choice on the part of medicare patients. Many thousands of persons covered under the program seek chiropractic treamtent. To deny them benefits is not the answer.

I would like to submit in the RECORD at this point a resolution passed by the Bend, Oreg., Golden Age Club:

Whereas, Chiropractic is a licensed healing art in the State of Oregon as well as 46 other States and Whereas, Chiropractic is recognized by over 500 insurance companies and State Industrial Accident Insurances and Whereas, Chiropractic is the second largest healing art in the United States and millions of citizens have utilized the services of Chiropractors including many elderly citizens and Whereas, the Oregon Senior Citizens Group and many others have requested Chiropractic be included in Medicare now. Be it therefore resolved that the Bend Golden Age Group, Inc. consisting of seventy to seventy five regular members of Bend, Oregon go on record as recommending Chiropractic services be included in Medicare.

The American Association of Retired Persons and the National Retired Teachers Association, which have a combined membership of 2 million members, met in Washington January 27 to 29 and the following statement concerning improved social security and medicare in regard to chiropractic services was adopted:

We suggest the inclusion of chiropractic services under part B of medicare.

These are two of the most recent expressions I have received from elderly citizen's associations who support the inclusion of chiropractic services under medicare.

Since medicare is an insurance-type program it is reasonable that the same options be available as in other health insurance. Evidence has been received by the Ways and Means Committee that most insurance companies provide for chiropractic coverage in their medical policies without any increase in premium.

VA FACES HEALTH CARE CRISIS

HON. DAVID R. OBEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Speaker, the ability of the Veterans' Administration to provide a quality medical program is waning. It could not be happening at a worse time.

Adding his warning to those sounded by Members of Congress, Dr. Stewart Wolf, regents professor of medicine at the University of Oklahoma School of Medicine and head of neurosciences of the Oklahoma Medical Research Foundation, has said:

The current national priorities, as reflected in the personnel ceiling policy and budget cuts imposed on the VA, threaten the quality of the veterans medical facilities at a time when they are about to be challenged by a great wave of discharged and handicapped GI's. . . .

The U.S. veteran population is over 27 million and increasing at the rate of about 75,000 per month as more servicemen are being discharged. Given such responsibility, this prediction from an American Legion magazine article deserves our attention:

Unless realistic investments of money are fed into the VA system in the very near future, the world's largest hospital system must head downhill.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to insert the article in its entirety:

CRISIS FACES VETERANS DUE TO SLASHES IN VA BUDGET

(NOTE.—The Veterans' Administration's ability to provide quality medical care for veterans—already hampered by money problems—was further hampered by a reduction of some $161 million dollars from its original budget request for the current year. Thus, a crisis faced by veterans served by the VA has been heightened.

The downward trend in VA budget funds was fought by Congressional veterans' affairs leaders all along the line. Last year, Committes of both Houses of Congress held hearings to point up the problems which face the VA and which will worsen if its funds are slashed again in future budgets. The hearings told the story of over $20 million in modern medical equipment standing idle in VA hospitals as of August 1969 for lack of funds to hire and train personnel to operate it; of seriously depleted staff levels; of manpower lost and services eliminated; of hundreds of thousands of pending actions and inquiries backlogged in VA regional offices for lack of staff to handle them; of cutbacks in matching funds to states for construction and operation of veterans' domiciliaries which would help relieve the federal crush; of a veteran population that is soaring at the rate of about 75,000 a month as Vietnam Era servicemen are being released from military duty; of the 235,000 U.S. servicemen in need of care for wounds and of how modern combat casualty evacuation techniques have saved thousands of severely wounded fighting men who in other wars might not have survived, thus placing them on the list of totally disabled veterans needing continual care at a time when funds are being whacked out of the agency whose function it is to care for veterans.

Legion Nat'l Rehabilitation Director E. H. Golembieski expressed the Legion's concern with these problems on Dec. 16, 1969, before the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

"The American Legion," he said, "is gravely concerned over the effects of repeated reductions in budget requests for the Veterans' Administration Department of Medicine and Surgery on its ability to deliver first-class health services to eligible veterans.

"As a result of the personnel reduction imposed by Section 201 of the Revenue and Expenditures Control Act of 1968; the denial of increased employee levels in the fiscal 1969 appropriation requests; and the recent Executive revision of Federal employment estimates, the VA is being forced to operate what was designed to be a second-to-none medical care program for the nation's sick and disabled veterans with inadequate and arbitrary personnel limitations."

Sen. Alan Cranston (Calif.), Chairman of the Subcommittee, had ordered the hearings to determine the effect of economy reductions on VA hospital and medical services and what it meant in human values to the nation's veterans. Golembieski presented figures showing that the VA hospital system is operating with the lowest personnel-patient ratio in the nation, averaging 1.5 personnel per patient as compared to a national community hospital ratio of 2.65 per patient and a university hospital ratio which varied from 3.5 to 4.0.

He said: "In reviewing the actions of the Executive arm of the federal government over the past several years, there is an evident unwillingness to accept the principle that the Veterans Administration is obliged not only to provide first-class medical care for veterans, but also, to the full extent of its professional and physical resources, to contribute to the advancement of medical knowledge through research, to the dissemination of medical knowledge through education, and to the education and training of sorely needed health manpower."

The VA's Administrator, Donald E. Johnson said: "The real crux of our budgetary problems, especially in our medical program areas, stems from enactment of the Revenue And Expenditures Control Act of 1968 (PL 90–364). Although the VA was specifically exempted from the expenditures limitations of the act, we were covered by the provisions of Section 201, which required us to roll back fulltime permanent employment to the number on duty as of June 30, 1966.

"From where we were as of July 1, 1968, this meant a reduction of 3,389 personnel needed to be made from onboard employment by attrition through not filling more than three out of each four ensuing vacanies. Due to the high rate of employment turnover in our medical programs, the reduction occurred by Nov. 1, 1968.

"In addition to the loss of 3,389 employees from where we were at July 1, 1968, as a result of PL–90–364, we also lost an increase of 3,376 in employment provided for in our fiscal 1969 appropriation request."

The total of those personnel figures is 6,765 employees. In the 1970 medical budget, the VA asked for 3,578 new employees. How many of these will actually be put on the job is questionable.

Another witness, Dr. Hugh Luckey, President of the New York Hospital-Cornell Medical Center, said: "Are we doing all we know how to do for our veterans? The answer is definitely no. Within the limitation of funds, personnel, and physical resources, the Department of Medicine and Surgery is doing a fine job. However, we would be deceiving ourselves if we did not admit that we could do better. . . . Do we have reason to be apprehensive about the future of health care in the VA? I would say the answer must be a resounding yes. We are in the midst of a severe health care depression in this country. . . . The VA is subject to the same pressures as exists in other areas of our health care system. Salaries of VA fulltime professional personnel are not competitive. . . . Many VA facilities are becoming obsolete. Funds to support research are so limited as to restrict this important attraction of high quality personnel. . . . In the face of this health, education and care depression, the future of our VA medical care system is foreboding. As it is for the other 200 million citizens of our country."

On returning and wounded Vietnam vets, Dr. Russell V. Lee, founder of the Palo Alto Medical Clinic and Clinical Professor of Medicine Emeritus at Stanford University, said: ". . . The veterans hospitals have done a remarkably good job in rehabilitation in many of the hospitals. Some of them are really outstanding, but they are not prepared, without some extra help, for the new burden they are going to have of getting these people back to duty. That means not only physical rehabilitation of the people to their wounds, but vocational rehabilitation so that they will be fitted for some sort of useful life into the future. This money, of course, is well spent, because those who can get back to useful occupations are going to be of enormous help in the productive activities of the country. . . . This requires more money, more money than they have had before, not less. And that was one of the reasons I was seriously concerned about the cut in funds for medical help in the VA. . . ."

From Dr. Stewart Wolf, Regents Professor of Medicine at the Univ. of Oklahoma School of Medicine and Head of Neurosciences of the Oklahoma Medical Research Foundation: "I should like to emphasize . . . the danger of deterioration of what has been a vital force in modern medicine in this country. . . . The current national priorities, as reflected in the personnel ceiling policy and budget cuts imposed on the VA, threaten the quality of the veterans medical facilities at a time when they are about to be challenged by a great wave of discharged and handicapped GI's. . . .

"In the recent past the VA has been able to attract the highest quality of professional staff. Today, however, there is a concern among potential recruits, in part because of the financial strictures, in part due to the vulnerability of the top administration to the winds of political change, but mainly as a consequence of a subtler problem, namely the feeling that the halcyon days are over. Thus, there is a real danger that the administration and the Congress are about to see veterans' hospitals revert to the mediocre status of the 20's and 30's, where tired physicians and political jobholders provided the care for the defenders of our country."

From Dr. Philip Lee, Chancellor of the Univ. of California Medical Center in San Francisco and former Assistant Secretary for Health and Scientific Affairs at HEW: ". . . I believe the budget cuts and restrictions on personnel have seriously affected the improvements in patient care that are needed in the veterans' hospitals and clinics. I believe that a minimum of $100 million is needed merely to convert the personnel deficit that has resulted from the ceilings imposed in the past several years.

"Second, funds are needed—about $100 million annually to build new hospitals and modernize existing hospitals and clinics in order that first-rate care can be provided.

"Third, funds are needed to construct research and teaching space in the new hospitals and provide it in existing university-affiliated hospitals. The cost for both of these needs can be provided by the VA, but I would estimate the need to be $30–$40 million a year for the next five years. These are urgent needs. They will improve patient care as no other investment by the VA can.

"Fourth . . . emphasis should be placed on correcting the 50,000 physician shortage, the 9,000 shortage in dentists, the 145,000 nurse shortage and the 200,000 allied health professional shortage. . . .

"Fifth, adequate funds need to be provided the VA for a major program of health facilities and health services research. There should be 10–20 such VA hospitals that are the centers for such research.

"Finally, . . . in answer to (the) basic questions, 'Are we doing all we can about this problem? Are we doing all we must?,' the answer is an emphatic no. The tragic fact is that we are asking the veteran to pay in his health for the anti-inflationary policies that are followed by the administration. I think we are asking him to pay too high a price."

Expert testimony of a more personal kind came from former Army Captain Max Cleland, 27, of Atlanta, Ga., a triple amputee who lost both legs and his right arm in an accidental grenade explosion in Vietnam. Capt. Cleland was awarded the Silver Star for gallantry in action.

Among other things, he discussed the delayed psychological repercussions that affect severely wounded battle casualties. He said: "Anyone who deals with a Vietnam returnee must understand this delayed, severe psychological symptom, and, in my opinion, more effort has to be made, especially by the VA, to insure that the small but select minority of Vietnam returnees in VA hospitals have adequate social, recreational and psychological activities to help them in readjusting to American life.

"Administrative transfer from the military service to the charge of the VA is for the wounded Vietnam returnee a deep psychological move closer to the realities of civilian life. It is highly important that this shift when it occurs not be complicated with administrative problems in adjustment of pay, securing of appropriate hospital equipment, finding the correct VA hospital to go to, calculation of disability compensation, driver training, etc. . . .

". . . This is certainly an area of interest to Congress to see that money and time are not wasted, and that a veteran can take heart from the fact that his government acts without a letter to Congress to prod it to do so."

Captain Cleland went on: "In summary, in a war everyone wishes to forget, it is too easy to forget the men who fought it, to forget that they are still this nation's charge, that they are managing more and more to survive severely disabling wounds, that they can take little comfort and find little peace in the division of attitudes concerning the war, and that finally, it is up to the agencies of this government to make an added effort in their behalf to meet their special physical and psychological problems. The American people should support with money and public concern the effort of this government to take care of its defenders. It seems the least this government can do for men who have shown their trust in this government in the most dramatic way."

The Committee on Veterans' Affairs of the House of Representatives was equally busy on the subject of the VA's budget crunch. On Oct. 9, 1969, its Chairman, Olin E. Teague (Tex.), told the House of Representatives that as of August 15 last year over $20 million of modern medical life-saving and life-prolonging equipment was standing idle in VA hospitals for lack of money to hire and train such personnel.

Rep. Teague said that the Revenue and Expenditures Control Act of 1968 had—and this was borne out by testimony of the VA's chief medical director and other independent experts at hearings—resulted in serious staffing shortages at VA hospitals throughout the country. He pointed out that the VA was running the largest single hospital system in the world with about half the personnel-patient ratio of the other modern hospital systems elsewhere in the nation. Compounding the problem was the huge increase in workload factors caused by returning Vietnam vets and a veteran population of over 27,000,000 (the bulk of it from WW2) grown older and needing increasing medical attention.

In the face of this, Rep. Teague noted, the budget submitted to Congress by President Nixon last April contained a recommendation that over 4,000 medical personnel be cut from the budget which had been recommended by the former President Johnson last January. On top of that, the Administration reimposed personnel ceilings resulting in the further loss of 634 more VA positions.

Congressman Teague estimated that even if the 166 VA hospitals were brought up to a minimum acceptable staffing ratio of 2.0 to each patient for general medical hospitals and 1.0 for psychiatric hospitals, over 28,000 additional hospital personnel would be needed. Under present pay scales, this item alone would cost some $240 million and still leave VA hospitals at only half the staff/patient ratio of general hospitals.

Another facet of the problem was brought out at Senate hearings by Dr. Irving G. Brick, the Legion's Rehabilitation Division Senior Medical Consultant. Referring to the additional role of VA hospitals as medical training institutions, he noted that "There is a strain in the relationships between some of the universities and the VA hospitals because of the fact that the hospitals have not been able to keep up with the modern practices of medicine. It seems to me that if the VA hospitals, which were designed to give the best care that the country can afford its veterans, are not giving the best care, do not have the appropriate facilities and the appropriate people, that there is going to be a greater deterioration.

"Look at what the VA hospital system has contributed to the education of medical students, of interns, of residents, these people who are taking special training that have made American medicine so great," he went on. "Fully half or more of the trainees in this country, if we include sophomore medical students, get some part of their medical training at VA hospitals. This is certainly true of the postgraduate specialties." (In 1968, over 10,000 medical students and thousands of other para-medical personnel were trained in the VA system.)

Dr. Brick continued: "What I am trying to say . . . is that here is a great national resource for the production of health manpower. . . . The VA knows how to do it. It is in the education field. It has been in the education field. I think we ought to think in terms of expanding the affiliation with medical schools. . . . I think that we should be trying to expand and strengthen and make the VA hospitals a great repository of medical education and research for the benefit not only of the veterans but of the whole country, because this is what happens when advances in medicine are made.

"It is for this reason that it now becomes distressing to me, after watching this great system flourish for more than 20 years, to see a slight beginning of deterioration because of budgetary restrictions. I think it is urgent, if we do not want this deterioration to increase, to do something about equalizing some of these facilities in the best modern manner possible."

These things now are pretty clear. The U.S. veteran population is over 27 million and increasing at the rate of about 75,000 per month as more servicemen are being discharged. Close to 250,000 U.S. servicemen have received non-fatal wounds in Vietnam—approximately 120,000 of them requiring hospitalization—with about 12,000 of these totally disabled. The rate of neuropsychiatric cases has doubled since 1965.

The VA's full-time employment of nurses and doctors is at about the same level as it was in 1965, while Vietnam casualties requiring hospital care increased more than 300 percent. (Part of the job load has been taken over by an increase in the number of part-time doctors, nurses, residents and interns, but many question if this is good practice.)

The VA's budget is as much a victim of inflation as any other segment of U.S. society. Its funds are being eaten up by increasing salary levels and sky-rocketing costs of equipment, construction, drugs and supplies. The budgetary cuts serve to deny the VA's operations the opportunity to provide for satisfactory professional staffing, operating expenses, the modernization and construction of necessary medical facilities, and the utilization of life-saving and life-prolonging facilities and equipment.

The current VA budget estimate included the tenth annual installment for financing a 15-year program of modernization of VA hospital and domiciliary facilities begun in 1960 to be applied at the rate of $75 million a year. That rate was not always met through the intervening years and the VA's problems with it increased as construction costs rose, older facilities deteriorated, and maintenance costs and inefficiency ratios climbed.

Unless realistic investments of money are fed into the VA system in the very near future, the world's largest hospital system must head downhill.

MISCALCULATION IN THE MIDDLE EAST

HON. JOSHUA EILBERG

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, refusal by the Nixon administration to sell Israel aircraft so vital for her defense is shocking, deplorable, and fraught with the dangers of miscalculation.

Israel is not, and has never been the aggressor in the Middle East. That nation has fought to survive, never to dominate. She has succeeded in three wars because she has known that defeat meant annihilation. The Arab States have lost three wars but their Governments survive, still calling for holy wars of vengeance. The first war Israel loses will be the last she fights, her voice forever still.

The persuasions of history have failed to impress the President and Secretary of State William P. Rogers. Rather their statements emphasize the naive hope that Moscow will cooperate in our search for a just peace, despite continuing Russian rejection of every past U.S. overture.

Last fall, U.S. negotiators thought they had wrested from their Russian counterparts an agreement on a framework for Middle East peace talks, only to be cynically rebuked.

Last week, Moscow delivered to Cairo an undisclosed number of surface-to-air missiles and 1,500 Russian troops to man them, in itself an act which badly upsets the balance of power in the Middle East in favor of the Arabs.

This week, the administration announces it will not sell vital jets to Israel because, in Secretary Rogers' words, "In our judgment, Israel's air capacity is sufficient to meet its needs for the time being." When questioned about the administration's logic that this repudiation of an American friend and ally would make Russia more flexible despite overwhelming evidence to the contrary, Secretary Rogers replied: "But there is always hope."

Israel will not long survive on the evanescent shards in Mr. Rogers' hope chest.

Israel cannot survive without clearly demonstrated superiority in the air. A nation of 3 million cannot outman or outgun 100 million enemies on the ground.

The sale of 110 French jets to Libya, jets that will end up in Nasser's hands, and the introduction of Russian-manned surface-to-air missiles already have compromised Israel's air superiority.

This administration speaks of peace despite the experience that the risk of war increases whenever the Arabs doubt Israel's military superiority.

This administration, by raising these doubts, has increased, not reduced, the risk of open war in the Middle East, and the specter of big-power confrontation there.

The administration speaks of bringing both Arabs and Israelis to the peace table, despite the common view that the Arabs will not go to the peace table until they surrender forever their foolish dreams of military conquest.

This administration, by feeding this Arab fantasy, has encouraged Arab belligerency and dimmed, rather than brightened, the prospects for peace talks.

Finally, and I raise this point reluctantly, there is the question of responsibility to a friend and ally. Israel has not asked very much, some 125 planes for which she is willing to pay. She has not asked for troops. She has not asked for direct intervention.

To betray such a friend and ally is nothing short of irresponsible.

This administration has put much stake in its claim that Israel's air capacity is sufficient for the time being. If it were insufficient, Mr. President, Israel would now be fighting a death-struggle on the beaches of the Mediterranean. Insufficiency means annihilation.

This administration has promised to keep "a close watch" on the military balance of power in the Middle East. It is my fervent prayer that history does not demand another Dunkirk before this administration comes to understand how delicate a thread survival really is.

ARTS AND HUMANITIES

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein the very pertinent remarks appearing in a recent edition of the New York Times of Hon. Barnaby C. Keeney, former distinguished president of Brown University warning Congress of the peril involved in neglecting the humanities.

Dr. Keeney's statement was delivered before the joint Senate-House subcommittee hearing held on President Nixon's proposed legislation that would double direct Federal subsidies to the arts and humanities to $40 million next year and extend the life of the program an additional 3 years beyond June 30, 1970.

To the best of my knowledge—

Said Keeney—

there is no way to bring various opposing forces together excepting by a better understanding of the past, a better analysis of the present and a better view of the future.

He said:

The Government devises programs that order what is best for even another country without understanding its history, its institutions or even its language.

It appears that the doctor's statements must be taken to heart by everyone in the Congress interested in balance of educational and cultural programs and that Congress must recognize the urgent need for supporting the humanities as well as science in our national education programs.

The preservation and projection of our rich cultural heritage is a necessary component of our scientific advancement, as well as the progress of the Nation, and Congress must continue to have that in mind when we are legislating in these areas.

Moreover, we must extend and adequately implement and support the entire arts and humanities program, since it is of great importance to the country and the American people.

I have urged the joint committee currently holding hearings in these matters to take prompt favorable action, so that Congress can pass the pending bill for arts and humanities at an early date. It is needed to prevent the fast encroaching vulgarian takeover engineered by those who aim at the destruction of our basic moral, cultural, linguistic values, and good manners, and who work to tear up our social and economic systems and free institutions by the roots.

They will never prevail.

Excerpts from Dr. Keeney's statement follow:

EXCERPTS FROM KEENEY REMARKS ON SCIENCE STRESS

WASHINGTON, January 26.—Following are excerpts from a statement made today by Dr. Barnaby C. Keeney, chairman of the National Endowment for the Humanities, at a joint Senate-House subcommittee hearing on the Arts and Humanities Act of 1965:

It is my own conviction that until the electorate and the persons they elect can use historical and philosophical material to help decide the major public questions of the day, we shall not solve those problems, and until the general public is capable of using knowledge of the past to solve personal problems, we shall not have an orderly society.

Certainly, many of the most important problems cannot be solved by science, which we have greatly supported and which has made many important contributions to our society. Science cannot solve these problems because scientists alone cannot decide what to do with the knowledge that is produced. There is a great imbalance in education at every level from school through graduate school in favor of the sciences. It is obvious from even the most casual inspection of any university campus, where most of the new buildings are for scientific uses.

I support and have supported government sponsorship of scientific research and teaching, but the imbalance is now so serious that it is seriously threatening the education of our next generation.

LACK OF UNDERSTANDING

What this country, and indeed the whole world lacks, is an understanding of the past, where we have been; the present, where we are; and the future, where we are going. An historical and analytical approach is essential.

Where we are is the result of where we have been and has a decisive influence on where we are going. Where we are now is in real trouble. We have cherished knowledge of material things, but we have not given sufficient attention to abstract considerations.

We have attempted to put new knowledge together with old assumptions in the naive belief that the more one knows the better one will understand, and possibly even accept.

The result has been the destruction of our system of values, so that our people now have no real guide for their lives. New assumptions are stated as proven fact and the result is violent disagreement, and I mean violent, or passive indifference, or, worst of all, an effort to accept several value systems.

A country of this size and complexity cannot proceed successfully without consensus on major issues and we no longer have this consensus, though possibly it is appearing, and again not so much as the result of scientific but of humanistic thought.

Our physical environment is in serious trouble. A frequently overlooked part of the environment is the intellectual. This consists of the product of thought, but it also consists of the product of taste and it contains the values of which I spoke.

Here we have little, if any, agreement. We have generation faced against generation, race against race. To the best of my knowledge, there is no way to bring various opposing forces together excepting by a better understanding of the past, a better analysis of the present and a better view of the future.

CONGRESS WARNED OF PERIL IN NEGLECT OF HUMANITIES

(By Nan Robertson)

WASHINGTON, January 26.—Congress was warned today that a growing imbalance of science teaching and research in relation to the humanities was dividing the nation, destroying its values and making it impossible to solve society's most serious problems.

Barnaby C. Keeney, historian and former president of Brown University, who now heads the National Endowment for the Humanities, told a joint Congressional subcommittee that American society was "in real trouble" because of the overwhelming emphasis on science and technology.

"It is my own conviction that until the electorate and the persons they elect can use historical and philosophical material to help decide the major public questions of the day, we shall not solve those problems," Dr. Keeney said.

MAJOR CONFLICTS SEEN

He was the first witness at hearings on President Nixon's proposed legislation that would double direct Federal subsidies to the arts and humanities to $40-million next year. The President has also asked Congress to extend the legislative life of the National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities three years beyond its present termination date of June 30, 1970.

Dr. Keeney said the nation now has "generation faced against generation, race against race."

"To the best of my knowledge," he continued, "there is no way to bring various opposing forces together excepting by a better understanding of the past, a better analysis of the present and a better view of the future."

The witness expanded on Mr. Nixon's call last month to bring "the lessons of our history to bear on the problems of the future."

Scientists "ought to be forced to answer" the questions of what impact their technological achievements will have upon the quality of life, but so far they have not done so, even on the White House level, Dr. Keeney charged.

"We can do all sorts of things," he said, "But why do we do it? Where do we want to go? What do we want to be?"

Any American college freshman can step on campus and instantly see by the new buildings devoted to science, where the priorities are, Dr. Keeney said. He sees that the history department is housed in a former dormitory condemned as a firetrap, "the English department is in the old physics building and the philosophy department is in what used to be the geology building. It gives a kid a sense of values very quickly."

In many ways, the would-be teacher also sees the gap, with "10 times as many fellowships awaiting the equally competent or less competent scientist" than the average humanist, Dr. Keeney added.

A PROBLEM IN HISTORY

When asked by Representative Ogden R. Reid, Republican of Westchester, why government kept making the "same mistakes" over and over, Dr. Keeney replied: "Because of an inadequate knowledge of history."

The Government, he said, devises programs that order "what is best for even another country without understanding its history, its institutions or even is language."

Dr. Keeney indicated that for these and other reasons, the National Endowment for the Humanities had shifted strongly from heavy funding of scholarship and research programs in its first year—1965—to educational programs.

The joint congressional subcommittee that heard his testimony was formed of members of the Senate Special Subcommittee on Arts and Humanities of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee and the House Select Subcommittee on Education of the Education and Labor Committee.

The next witness, scheduled for Wednesday's hearing, is Nancy Hanks, chairman of the National Endowment for the Arts.

The national endowments for the humanities and the arts were created by Congress in 1965 and provide Government funds for special projects in these fields.

THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE YALTA CONFERENCE

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Stefan Kleczkowski, a former journalist for the London Daily Mail, acquired a reputation over the years for proper insight into the complications in Eastern Europe and especially Poland. Therefore, I insert into the RECORD his article which appeared in the March 1970, edition of the London Contemporary Review in which he discusses the significance of the 25th anniversary of the Yalta Conference. As we gaze at the map of Eastern Europe, the unfortunate consequences of the Yalta Conference literally stare us in the face.

THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE YALTA CONFERENCE

(By Stefan Kleczkowski)

February 11, 1970, marks the twenty-fifth anniversary of the abortive Yalta Conference which decided the fate of Poland, without its consent, as it was within its September 1, 1939, frontiers, duly recognised by the whole world.

Contrary to the provisions of the Anglo-Polish Treaty of Mutual Defence signed on August 25, 1939, this conference was conducted in absence of a legal representative of the allied Polish Government then officiating in London and fully recognised and honoured by the Governments of Great Britain and of the United States of America. In other words, the Fifth Partition of Poland was effected by the three Contra-acting Powers (Britain, U.S. and Soviet Russia) without the presence of a delegate of the legal Polish Government being invited to participate in its deliberations. Thus a breach of international law was caused, and the fate of an ancient nation and 'the first and most faithful ally' (Churchill) settled without any obligatory formality, with the result that Poland, a western and Christian nation, with a population of over 32 million, was squeezed by force into the orbit of the Soviet Communist Empire. This was done despite the efforts and sacrifices of the Polish troops then fighting under the British Command, and subsequent huge losses in manpower and treasure on all the battlefields of Europe and Africa.

At the same time, the country was deprived of 46 per cent of its national territory by the establishment of an artificial frontier running from the city of Grodno in the North, along the river Bug in the centre, to the great fortress of Przemysl in the south—i.e. the so-called 'Curzon Line' which was suggested as a demarcation line for an armistice between Poland and the Soviet Union then at war in 1919. This partition and subjugation of Poland was never recognised by the lawful London Polish Government and by the Polish nation because, after the Russian troops occupied it, it never had been a free agent to express its will.

The partitioning powers took no notice of Poland's stand on this vital question, contrary to the international law, and only informed its London Representatives when their wartime ally was of no further use to them. The final blow came on July 5, 1945, when the Governments of Great Britain and America jointly decided to 'withdraw their recognition' from the London Polish Government, and sent it packing into the wilderness, in which it still remains to this day.

Thus, five years of Poland's tremendous losses and sacrifices (nearly 6 million dead and 2 million deported to the Soviet concentration camps) were cynically sacrificed by the western allies in order to appease a notoriously insatiable and treacherous Communist partner. It was in fact 'more than a crime'—a mistake as Talleyrand would put it, as the subsequent events had shown.

From the point of view of international law this tragic transaction was, of course, null and void, but in the prevailing circumstances, and in view of the unwillingness of the western allies to defend its wartime partner, it was an operation of doubtful moral standards and far less political wisdom and foresight.

To-day Great Britain is paying dearly for this 'mistake' by facing the threat of Soviet aggression right in the centre of Europe, within only 400 miles of the British coast, a threat which is daily growing stronger and more menacing, as Soviet Russia is building up its conventional forces and nuclear power in Europe, and acquiring new advance bases in the Middle East and the Mediterranean.

For the record, it should be stated that the Anglo-Polish Treaty of Mutual Defences of August 25, 1939, was a freely concluded agreement in which Britain undertook to resort to arms in defence of Poland's independence in the event of an unprovoked German attack.

It was preceded by a one-sided declaration made by Mr. Neville Chamberlain on March 31, 1939, in the House of Commons, a declaration soon to be converted into a 'reciprocal mutual defence agreement'. So strengthened, Poland was ready to oppose Hitler's demands for a free passage across the Polish Corridor and for the incorporation of the Free City of Danzig into the Third Reich. The subsequent inclusion of the Polish forces under British command further strengthened this agreement in the name of Anglo-Polish brotherhood-in-arms.

The existence of a formal British undertaking to defend Poland was made public by Mr. M. Petheric, MP, on February 28, 1948, during the Yalta debate. The secret protocol attached to it specified that it became applicable only in case of German aggression, while section 1, paragraph 5, provided for reciprocal help in the event of such an aggression. Clause 3 further stated that 'any new undertaking which the Contracting Powers undertook under the present agreement shall neither limit nor indirectly create new obligations between the Contracting Parties not participating in these undertakings and the third State concerned'. In a further paragraph it was stated that 'should such an agreement be entered into by the Contracting Parties either the sovereignty or territorial inviolability of the other Contracting Party' shall not be affected. Sir Anthony Eden's declaration fully confirms this interpretation of the said treaty of defence.

In connection with the signature of the Polish-Soviet pact of July 30, 1941, Sir Anthony Eden wrote to the late General W. Sikorski, wartime Polish Premier and C. in C., as follows: 'I avail myself of this opportunity to inform you that in accordance with the Anglo-Polish Treaty of Mutual Defence of August 25, 1939, the British Government has not given the Soviet Government any undertaking which could affect its relationship between Poland and the U.S.S.R. I wish to assure you at the same time that the British Government does not recognise any territorial changes effected in Poland from August 1939.' This was an undertaking to defend Poland's independence and the integrity of its territory, and was in accord with the Atlantic Charter, signed by all the wartime allies on August 14, 1941.

It is, therefore, unfortunate to recall that during the Yalta debate in the House of Commons on February 28, 1945, Sir Anthony Eden should have interpreted the treaty of defence in a narrower sense, that is, by stating that it referred only to Germany, not to Soviet Russia. This new interpretation was contrary to the text of the treaty of defence, together with its secret protocol, as well as Sir Anthony's personal declaration.

Count Edward Raczynski, wartime Polish Ambassador, commenting on this in his book entitled: The Anglo-Polish Alliance, concludes that 'this treaty included a reciprocal undertaking of mutual help understood very widely, although it does not specify the guarantee interests in Latvia, Esthonia and Rumania which tie to Poland's eastern territories.' This is an undeniable proof that both parties to the treaty of defence took these matters under their consideration which were based on the existing territorial status in the then prevailing political systems of which the Polish Republic was an essential member within the boundaries of the Riga Treaty, recognised by Great Britain in 1923. Moreover, the Atlantic Charter signed in London on May 26, 1942, between Britain and Soviet Russia as well as other states, guaranteed that these powers would not seek territorial aggrandisement, should recognise the right of all nations for self-determination and refuse to interfere in the affairs of other nations.

Under the circumstances, the Polish Government could never agree to any changes of its national territory except after consultation with the legally elected Polish Parliament sitting in Warsaw. Since that government stayed in the U.K. throughout the war, it could not possibly condone such changes. In the absence of a parliamentary mandate, the whole transaction had no chance of being put into effect and could not, therefore, be binding on Poland.

So much for the legal aspect of the Yalta Agreement. Apart from the above-mentioned treaty obligations, the Poles relied throughout the war on Mr. Churchill's promises made in the House of Commons and elsewhere. In one of such speeches he said 'It is the earnest desire of the British Government that Poland should be mistress in her own house and captain of her soul.' Speaking in the House on February 8, 1945, he again stated that 'to break altogether with the lawful Government of Poland, which had been recognised during all the five years of war, would be an act subject to the most severe criticism in England. Great Britain would be charged with forsaking the cause of Poland.'. . .

These declarations left no doubt in the hearts and minds of the Poles fighting under British Command and of the London Polish Government as to how Britain stood towards Poland's independence, and they were therefore hopelessly disappointed when they found out, after the conclusion of the Yalta Agreement, that everything they fought for was scrapped on the altar of political expediency, contrary to international law, and to Great Britain's real interests. They remembered that Britain went to war to defend Poland on the clear understanding that by so doing she was defending herself, at least temporarily, from the threat of the German attack. Although promises were made of loans and war materials, none was kept, but Poland had stood its ground for as long as possible, until the 'Soviet stab in the back', when further resistance was useless.

Although some military commentators today question the wisdom of Poland's stand in 1939, it is now clear that it gave Britain breathing space and saved her from the German air attacks for at least a year. That Poland played its role successfully, was admitted obliquely by Herr Alfred Speer, Hitler's wartime minister of munitions, in a Sunday Telegraph statement that his chief 'made a mistake in attacking Poland. It should have been a military demonstration on the Austrian and Czechoslovak model.' Unfortunately for Hitler, it misfired and Germany lost at least a year before she attacked Britain.

President Roosevelt's attitude towards Poland was always ambiguous. All he was interested in at Yalta was that 'Poland will be thoroughly friendly to the Soviet for years to come', which in fact meant complete domination by Soviet Russia. All he really wanted was to find a tool with which to rope in the votes of American Poles in the forthcoming Presidential Elections. An ill and dying man in Yalta, he was no match for the bloody, cunning and treacherous tyrant who faced him across the conference table, and who twisted him around his little finger.

The result was that the Yalta Conference opened the door for Soviet Russia not only for the domination of Eastern Europe, but of the whole European Continent, with a clear threat of further aggression following the ruthless incorporation of Czechoslovakia in 1968. Furthermore, it dealt a mortal blow to the whole structure of the British Empire because it undermined the confidence of its members in Britain's real strength, of which the failure of the 'Suez affair' was but a link in the chain-reaction which it set off.

The conclusion is that the hope of a peaceful co-existence with Soviet Russia is a myth, because she is not interested in such a pipe-dream but in the domination of the world.

REMARKS BY RICHARD J. O'MELIA ABOUT AIR TRAFFIC ENFORCEMENT

HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI

OF WISCONSIN

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, a former resident of my district, Richard J. O'Melia, Director, Bureau of Enforcement, Civil Aeronautics Board, delivered a very important message before the Association of Group Travel Executives in New York on March 5, 1970.

With the traffic problems being what they are, I am sure the remarks that follow will be of interest to Members of Congress and the general public:

REMARKS BY RICHARD J. O'MELIA, DIRECTOR, BUREAU OF ENFORCEMENT, CIVIL AERONAUTICS BOARD, BEFORE THE ASSOCIATION OF GROUP TRAVEL EXECUTIVES, NEW YORK, MARCH 5, 1970

It is a pleasure to meet with you today to discuss the functions and activities of the Civil Aeronautics Board's Bureau of Enforcement. As you may know on January 23, 1970, the Bureau, not the Board, filed complaints against five air carriers, eight travel agents, 15 organizations and 17 individuals alleging violations of the Federal Aviation Act and the Board's Economic Regulations. This action was taken as a result of the Bureau's year-long West Coast charter investigation.

There has been some misconception within the general public and in parts of the industry that our enforcement complaints sought immediate suspension and/or revocation of air carrier authority on the North Atlantic. Some have even charged that we set out to destroy a segment of the air transport industry. However, a reading of our recent enforcement complaints will make it clear that our petitions asked for suspensions only against four carriers on the North Atlantic, on the basis of alleged violations of the Act.

It should be emphasized that the filing of complaints by the Bureau of Enforcement does not constitute any action or prejudgment by the Board itself. All respondents named in our complaint have full rights to due process.

The carriers and other parties under the Board's rules are entitled to full and fair hearings before a hearing examiner who will issue his decision based on evidence submitted, subject to the Board's discretionary review. No interim relief is granted, nor can a carrier be suspended in economic enforcement cases except after a hearing and a final decision that the nature and extent of the violations justify such action.

To my knowledge, there has never been an enforcement problem which precipitated such great public interest. Our enforcement efforts to bring illegal charters under control have drawn mixed reactions from the industry, from Congress and from the general public. There are some from each of those areas who have vigorously opposed enforcement action while there are others who have just as vigorously applauded our efforts.

As to the charge that by filing our complaints we were attempting to destroy a segment of the air transport industry, let me say, that it is such a ludicrous statement I will not dignify it by denying it. But to set the record straight, the Bureau of Enforcement, as it has in the past, will file complaints against any segment of the transportation industry, whenever and wherever violations of the Federal Aviation Act and the Board's regulations are found. Let there be no doubt about that.

The Board's enforcement program, although relatively small, is an indispensable part of the Board's overall work. We have a total staff of 33 which includes 10 attorneys in our Legal Division, six Investigators in our Investigation Division—the same number we had in 1952—and five professional staff people in our Consumer Complaint Section. The Bureau's function is to: (1) obtain compliance with the economic provisions of the Federal Aviation Act and with the regulations, orders, certificates, permits, exemptions, and other requirements issued thereunder; (2) prevent improper claims for subsidy and unfair and deceptive practices, and restrictive competition; (3) protect the public from unjust discrimination and mistreatment by air carriers and their agents; and (4) improve the quality and dependability of air transportation service. In the public interest, the Bureau seeks to assure that the complaints of individual travelers and shippers will receive prompt and proper consideration.

The Board's enforcement responsibilities cover 39 certificated air carriers, 12 supplemental air carriers, 136 foreign air carriers (a total of 187 airlines), 146 authorized domestic and international air freight forwarders, about 3,500 air taxi operators, who are subject to some degree of economic regulation, a number of intrastate and commercial operators who become involved in interstate or foreign common carriage, and thousands of travel agents who are subject to section 411 of the Act, which empowers the Board to investigate competitive practices among air carriers and travel agents.

I doubt that the Federal Aviation Act and the Board's regulations would have meaningful effect without the machinery to insure reasonable compliance. That is where enforcement comes in. It is our responsibility to preserve the integrity of the laws and regulations by filing complaints where necessary through appropriate enforcement processes.

I have given the above figures to show that charter violations are only one part of our workload. However, in recent months, they certainly have been taking an increasing amount of the Bureau's time. It appears from our continuing investigation, notwithstanding the recent complaints that we filed, that charter violations are like old soldiers, they never die; in fact, they don't even appear to be fading away.

Travel Age West reported last week that its editor joined a charter on the West Coast 48 hours before it departed for Europe. He paid his money, joined a group that backdated his membership card six months and off he flew. He also reported interviewing many other passengers on the flight who had just joined for the purpose of a low-cost trip to Europe and were not bona fide members of the chartering organization.

The Federal Aviation Act and the Board's regulations differentiate between charter flights by supplemental airlines and individually-ticketed operations of the scheduled airlines, primarily by requiring that charter service be offered only to bona fide charter organizations and not to travel agents, who are in the business of soliciting these customers from the general public (except with respect to ITC's and BIT's). In my opinion, the public's serious misunderstanding of the Board's charter regulations is due either to the failure of the industry, or in some cases, to persons, who refuse to accept the fact that special conditions must be observed, to distinguish between legitimate charters and individually-ticketed service.

As you may know, the Board holds the carrier primarily responsible for screening a charter flight and for insuring its conformance to the Board's regulations. It should be made clear that the Board is not empowered to physically cancel flights. The Board's staff brings charter problems to the carrier's attention as far in advance of the flight departure date as possible. If the carrier elects to go ahead and operate the flight in the face of such notice, then it risks possible enforcement action after the flight. However, the carriers do cancel many charter flights when questions as to charterworthiness are brought to their attention.

You are all familiar with the West Coast charter complaints through the publicity given them in the press, on radio and TV and through trade publications, etc. You may also know that we are continuing our investigation on the East Coast.

If any one in this room is planning a charter flight this summer, let me tell you what you can do to make sure your charter flight is legitimate and that it won't be canceled at the last minute: You should know whether the organization you belong to is charterworthy. In making this determination in connection with your flight, you should consider the following:

(1) How long has the organization been in existence.

(2) Does it function for purposes other than travel.

(3) Did you join the organization for reasons other than travel.

(4) Has there been public solicitation of the flight in which you are interested.

(5) How long have you been a member.

(6) Were you a member before the flight was announced and a member for at least six months.

(7) Is the price of the air trip based on a pro rata share of the cost of the charter or have you been asked to pay other charges such as registration fees, membership fees or special contributions.

You should also be sure to check to see that the air carrier scheduled to perform the charter has a contract with the organization with which you are affiliated.

To put it another way, our East Coast charter investigation has pinpointed the principal charter violations as (1) the acceptance of flight participants who are not bona fide members of the chartering organization, (2) the collection of charges over and above the pro rata cost of the flight, (3) the carriage of an excessive percentage of one-way passengers, (4) the intermingling of passengers between going and returning flights and (5) the back-dating of membership cards for six months.

The modus operandi on the East Coast is to conduct charter flights under an arrangement whereby participants are first sold tickets through legitimate travel agents in the New York/New England area. Transportation originally is sold for travel at somewhat less than the group fare rates on scheduled route carriers. These transactions are later liquidated when the agents transfer the passengers over to passenger consolidators who have chartered flights through various organizational fronts, some of which are identified as bona fide organizations and others which exist in name only. There are several such consolidators operating on the East Coast and it is estimated that there are more than 150 agents participating in these transactions.

We have found that the legally objectionable charters on the East Coast have operated by using large retail or wholesale travel agents who have obtained commitments from carriers for a number of charter flights. It often comes about that the wholesaler cannot get enough charterworthy organizations to fill a large commitment, and even where legitimate organizations charter the flights, they often have difficulty in filling the planes. The wholesaler then broadcasts to the small retail agents his call for bodies.

With this information at his desk, the small retailer is ready to steer those who want a cheap trip. For his service in producing the passengers, the small agent may earn from $25 to $35 or more per head. Sometimes the "passenger" is charged a registration or membership fee which makes the total cost larger than the pro rata share of the charter cost. A membership card is then sent to the passenger who has purchased the seat. As a final indignity, the passenger is often required to sign a statement that he has been a member of the organization for more than six months.

The common denominator of charter problems, on both coasts, is illegal profits. If this problem could be resolved, many other abuses would disappear because there would not be the inducement to indulge in illegal charter practices in the first place. The whole effect of these abuses has been to provide cut-rate, individually-ticketed, flights to the general public through the guise of charters. Much of the general public is apathetic to the charter requirements and could care less about them, so long as they can buy air transportation substantially below scheduled airline fares.

The gross profit potential to passenger consolidators on the East Coast is from $10,000 to $15,000 per flight. Although we have no statistics showing the number of such flights operated, the activity indicates that there must be several hundreds.

Several cases have been developed on the East Coast to a point where formal complaints can be considered. Let me here again emphasize that our enforcement problems with charters are not limited to any one class of air carriers. The charter problems extend to all categories of air carriers—U.S. and foreign route carriers, foreign charter carriers and U.S. supplemental carriers. There is much room for educational work in apprising the public of the existence of our charter regulations, to avoid last minute cancellations which could result in the stranding of thousands of innocent people who have saved and planned for low-cost charter trips. If the charter organizations and their individual members are made aware of the regulations, we can reduce charter abuses without jeopardizing the tremendous benefits of charter transportation.

The Board's staff has been studying proposed changes in our charter regulations. The National Association of Air Carriers has submitted a rule-making proposal for suggested charter regulation changes. The Civil Aeronautics Board is expected to move forward on this front in the near future. Please be assured that any new charter regulations will be promulgated only after all segments of the aviation industry and the general public have been heard, so that there will be no misunderstanding as to what constitutes legitimate charters.

In the meantime, the Bureau of Enforcement will enforce the present charter regulations to the best of its ability.

You are all aware, I am sure, of the ever-increasing, and sometimes revolutionary, changes taking place in the airline industry, primarily because of the transitional changes in equipment, piston to jet, jet to wide-bodied jet, and soon to supersonic jets. You probably haven't given much thought to the changes which have been occurring in our enforcement activities within the industry and you may be of the impression that our enforcement process today is the same as it was many years ago. Not so. We have had our changes too and I consider them evolutionary.

For example, there is an entirely new group of entities, which command our enforcement attention today, that were nonexistent several years ago. The latest in this new category is the bulk inclusive tour operator. He was brought into being just this past year through the Board's approval of an IATA resolution which established this new type of indirect passenger air carrier.

These regulations had hardly been put into print before our enforcement problems began. One formal complaint already has been filed against a bulk inclusive tour operator and it is presently being settled with a consent cease and desist order. The BIT regulation requires a large surety bond for each tour program or, in the alternative, an escrow bank account and a smaller surety bond for each flight. This particular operator failed to abide by either requirement. When a BIT operator fails to meet these financial requirements, the Bureau of Operating Rights, which processes the prospectus filed by the BIT operator, then refers the matter to us for appropriate enforcement action to ensure compliance with the regulations.

Another similar entity is the inclusive tour charter (ITC) operator which has been in existence for several years. This operator charters aircraft from supplemental carriers and sells inclusive tours to the public. He must meet requirements which are basically similar to those of the bulk inclusive tour operators. There are many such operators located throughout the country and there are thousands of travel agents who may act as subagents for these tour operators. Advertising practices, financial responsibilities and many other facets of such operations demand enforcement attention. However, with our limited staff we are obviously unable to make the total surveillance desired of all such operators.

One of the most intriguing new entities is the aircraft lease operator who also came into being only within the past few years. This operator engages in unauthorized air transportation through the guise of dry-leasing aircraft ostensibly in the manner that Hertz and Avis lease cars. However, the aircraft lease operator actually retains control of the operation and, in effect, furnishes charter air transportation without authority similar to that provided by legitimate carriers. Thus, he circumvents the economic requirements of the Board and the safety requirements of the Federal Aviation Act.

The stage was set, so to speak, for such operations when piston engine aircraft were replaced with jet equipment, thereby making available DC–7's and Constellations that could be picked up literally for a dollar and a promise. Enterprising promoters then obtained these aircraft and operated them, ostensibly under a dry lease of equipment arrangement, for any individuals and companies desiring to obtain cut-rate transportation.

The enforcement pattern showed that the operations became increasingly sophisticated and complex, obviously in an effort to preserve the guise of a private lease operation. The operators go so far as to draw up two separate sets of contracts, one for the lease of the aircraft and one for furnishig of of the aircraft and one for furnishing of the arrangements appear as just a dry lease of the aircraft. To rebut this requires considerable investigative digging to show that the aircraft lessor masterminds the entire operations and, in effect, through the integration of the various services, provides a wet lease or charter flight. After considerable investigation, we developed sufficient evidence to file a complaint against one of the larger aircraft lease operators who was charged with engaging in unauthorized air transportation. Fortunately, these operations have been mostly in the cargo rather than passenger field. Otherwise, there might be some cause for concern by persons using such air services since the flights are operated only under the general aviation rules (the same as apply to small private aircraft operations), which are much less stringent than those for air carriers and commercial operators of large transport equipment. Unfortunately, some of the public do not consider the safety aspects of such operations and are blinded by the seeming bargain of a flight price much lower than that charged by a legitimate operator who must conform to air carrier standards.

The economic effects of such operations are also devastating, and unless they are controlled, the legitimate carriers will be placed in an impossible competitive position. For example, such operators, having no tariff requirements and knowing what the tariff rates of legitimate carriers are, can underbid the price to the extent necessary in order to get the business.

The new "Truth in Lending Act" is another area which has been recently added to our enforcement responsibilities. It is our job to insure that the public is protected, under the terms of this Act, insofar as the credit sale of air transportation is concerned. This part of our activity is being handled by the Bureau's Consumer Complaint Section.

The public's growing interest in charter flight services has brought into existence all sorts of specialists. We now have with us a charter service wholesaler. He specializes in package tours based on charter transportation. Such a wholesaler blocks charter space to popular resort areas on carriers and then prepares a package using ground services he has arranged on a group-use basis.

These packages are then sold to retail travel agents to fill their needs for large groups where charter service would have an appeal. When the package is sold to a retail travel agent, the wholesaler realizes his profit from the land package and the retailer earns the commission from the carrier for the charter flight.

While this only a variation on an old theme, it shows how quickly innovators adjust in this constantly changing industry. Although we have not established, as yet, that such operations involve violations of our regulations, we are concerned that the arrangements involving the entry of a wholesaler in a controlling position in the charter field may create enforcement problems in the future.

Another new innovation in our industry involves real estate flights which are operated to carry prospective purchasers to land development sites, such as those being promoted in the Southwest, in Florida, and in the Caribbean. Many passengers sign up for these trips because of the appeal of free or reduced rate travel but fail to realize, as indicated in complaints received in our office, that they will be subjected to extreme promotional pressures to make property purchases.

I am sure that most of you have heard of the private flying clubs which purchase aircraft that are utilized to carry club members on exotic flights. So long as the flights are confined to bona fide members of the clubs, we consider the operations to be private carriage outside of the Board's jurisdiction. However, the line between private and common carriage is a fine one and through public soliciation and acceptance of persons other than their bona fide members, some clubs may have, in our opinion, engaged in air transportation. There are no definite rules, from an economic standpoint, for flying clubs so, consequently, our enforcement problems become ones of interpretation of the facts.

Recognizing that public response to enforcement action is not always favorable, I am reminded of what President Lincoln once said about "duty":

"If I were to try to read, much less answer, all the attacks made on me, this shop might as well be closed for any other business. I do the very best I know how—the very best I can, and I mean to keep doing so until the end. If the end brings me out all right, what is said against me won't amount to anything. If the end brings me out wrong, then ten angels swearing I was right, would make no difference."

"WHAT HAPPENED TO THE BEAUTIFUL AMERICA?"—SACRAMENTO CHILDREN SPEAK OUT AGAINST POLLUTION

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I have recently come across a series of quite poignant statements about environmental quality. And I am deeply impressed by these remarks, not only because they come from students ranging in age from 6 to 17, but because they show the real anguish that younger persons feel over the world they will be living in.

These statements come from students in the Sacramento County school system and were compiled in the schools superintendent's bulletin for March 1970.

[From the Sacramento (Calif.) County Schools Superintendent's Bulletin, Mar. 1970]

(Recognition goes to students from the following schools. Short selections were made from a great quantity of excellent material in an attempt to convey the intense concern young people feel for their environment and their commitment to the future. All the material submitted adds to the feeling of concern and commitment and is as valuable as what you read here.

WHEN I WAS YOUNG

"When I was young we used to come down here to the creek and find frogs and polliwogs and things. Now it's just full of oily water and people throw their junk here."—George, grade 6.

"People all over the country are destroying the air with smoke. People are throwing trash in the rivers. People are flooding the animal's homes. They also destroy animal's homes when they forget to put out a campfire and the forest burns. People are wasting food, water and wood."—Stanley, grade 3.

"When I went fishing the water was dirty. The fish were almost dead. Campers had thrown papers and bottles in the water."—Terry, grade 3.

"Water is polluted and smells bad. Fish are dying. Lake's are becoming the dumps and you can't swim. I wish things were beautiful and animals more alive."—Linda, grade 6.

"Did you know the water you drink has had paper, beer cans, coke bottles, oil from the smog causing car, and maybe the old car itself thrown into it?"—Allen, grade 5–6.

"When we went for a boat ride it was a lot of fun, but the only thing was the water. It was badly polluted. It had bubbles like detergent was in it. It had paper and other litter—twigs, driftwood, and cans floating all over. It smelled very bad. There were dead fish all over the place. The bank was just as bad if not worse. It was really a miracle we got used to the smell. I wonder how the people that live there get used to it?"—Robin, grade 5–6.

"Oil sometimes gets in water from busted oil wells and from boats. This is not good for fish or any other animals. When ducks are around the oil gets on their wings and they can't fly?"—Susan, grade 6.

"Our water resources are being abused and destroyed at an alarming rate. Industries pour their waste into nearby streams or waterways because it's cheaper that way. Campers and tourists find it less bothersome to dispose of their trash into the lake. Even the so-called 'gutter flooder' is at fault. Some might say that this is a result of the public not being informed, but really it's more like a case of 'it's not my fault, somebody else is doing it.' "—Karen, grade 11.

"I bend down to sip
The cold clear water, but pause
To watch the scum pass."
—Kim Fisher.

"Our environment leaves a lot to be desired. There is too much air pollution around us. The smog around us comes from our own doings. We make it when people work in factories to make clothes, goods, etc. Smog and air pollution comes mainly from smoke. The smoke comes from car engines through the exhaust pipes into the air. Also the smoke comes from burning trash, burning houses and such."—Connie, grade 6.

"Each year tons and tons of garbage are dumped into our rivers and lakes; suds from washing machines, chemicals from factories, water so hot it kills animal life by changing their natural environment. You can walk by rivers in your own town and see debris being dumped into our water supply. Why is this allowed?"—Craig, grade 12.

"Clean water is essential to life. Yet many waterways are used as dumps for raw sewage, garbage, and industrial wastes. Water pollution comes from two major sources. First, our cities, towns, and villages dump untreated sewage and garbage into the nearest streams. Second, industries discharge wastes consisting of acids, chemicals, greases, oils, and animal and vegetable matter. Such materials poison drinking water and endanger public health. They destroy commercial fisheries. They prevent fishing, boating, bathing and other recreational uses of the poisoned waterways."—Paula, grade 8.

"Company's wastes go into lakes and rivers, factory smoke pollutes the air, and then there's the uncontrollable litter the people throw out everywhere. Exhaust fumes from cars and many other things are polluting our land."—David, grade 6.

"What happened to the Beautiful America? Now all you see in the city is dirty, filthy skies. The smog is so bad in some cities you can't even see the moon at night."—Martha, grade 8.

"It goes down river,
Hidden in all the water,
all of the topsoil."
—Terry Palmer.

"Until a few years ago people really didn't think much of air pollution as a serious problem but now some people think of it third only to Vietnam and inflation. The skys are darkening faster than the public thinks and by the rate it's going now the earth could be sterile by the 21st century. It is upsetting the balance of nature and the ability of the plants to produce their best is being impaired by the growing problem of air pollution."—Steven, grade 8.

"The problem of DDT is very bad because it causes some birds to become extinct. A man could spray a bush with DDT so that when it rains the DDT washes off into the gutter and then gradually into lakes and streams. The fish then eats some DDT and dies. Then the bird eats the fish and it causes a disease in the bird, so when the bird lays an egg the shell is soft and the bird crushes the egg, thus, the bird becomes extinct. This could also happen to Man, by spraying DDT on crops, then the cows and pigs eat the crops, then Man eats the animal and gradually builds up a supply of DDT in himself. This is one way to solve the population explosion, but not the right way."—Trudie, grade 5–6.

"The problem of litter has grown very much since the war. Industries that produce boxes, bottles, cans, cartons, gadgets, and a thousand varieties of paper products has aided our litter problems. The government is spending about $750,000 a year to remove trash and litter from the parks."—Stephanie, grade 5–6.

"The majority of people disregard and are unaware of the destructive problem of air pollution. Never before has the air in which we live been polluted to the extent it is today. Air pollution has an adverse effect on our economy. The deterioration, maintenance and need for replacement of materials, structures and machines is greatly increased by air pollution. More tragic, the pollution levels usually observed damage vegetation. A multitude of field crops are poisoned by many of the contaminants in smog. Smog damages our forest trees. For some three billion Ponderosa and Jeffery pines in the San Bernardino National forest smog is becoming fatal. The dying pines are the first known casualties in the conifer forests. Our resources can not last forever, and their wasting away by air pollution will surely hurt our economy."—Jeanie, grade 12.

"See the pretty coat.
It's made of pure leopard skin.
Where are the leopards?"
—Hank Tonnemacher.

"I think that we should have left the forest and the bay the way that they were before we chopped down the trees and filled up the bay. It was better in the old days when we didn't have cars and things like that."—Karen, grade 5–6.

"I know that some of the trees have to be cut down for lumber . . . so many trees are cut down when it comes to Christmas. People should stop cutting down some of them because they are beautiful. Just think if there were no trees when you go camping. If there were no trees when you woke up you coudn't hear the birds singing . . . I like to live in this world but it wouldn't be worth it if I can't see the trees in the spring and winter and summer. Trees are one of nature's gifts and they need to be saved."—Ruth, grade 4.

"I know we have to kill some animals sometimes for food, but why do people have to kill racoons, rabbits, and foxes for their fur just to have a coat or a hat of animal's furs only to look good? Why can't they let animals be free, not shoot the birds, rabbits, and foxes just for fun but for a special reason like for food and useful things? So why don't we save wild animals?"—Julie, grade 4.

"I feel very bad about the soil breaking away. Without soil we can not plant food. Cows can not eat then the cows will die and so will we and other animals, too. The plants will die and not look pretty."—Diane, grade 4.

"We have a tendency to drive valuable soil to rotten soil. We also disuse the soil. Take for example the Sacramento Metropolitan Airport. Under that airport is rich soil. They could have built it somewhere else, but no they had to put it there! Also by the levee road there is valuable soil but it is filthy—beer cans, weeds, and other junk litter that place."—Matt, grade 6.

"Our rich land has cities and company's buildings on it and our poor land they leave for the farmers. Lots of farmers are moving to the big cities or they are selling their land to big companies and also freeways are going through them. It is not good at all!"—Danny, grade 6.

"As our population has increased at an uncontrollable rate, so have our problems of waste disposal, urban sprawl, and noise, air, water, and land pollution.

"We are making unreasonable demands upon our technology. We have asked for increased food production, and we are now faced with the problem of pesticide pollution; we have required more land to 'live' on, and we have less to enjoy; we have expected faster and faster transportation, and we have received the noise and pollution which is inherent in this. In general we have demanded progress, even at the price of life itself."—Mark, grade 11.

"There are empty buildings near my home that were zoned for business but they are overgrown with weeds. Some people and children dump trash there. If the property gets run down the value of our property will also go down. There are too many billboards and signs and old unused buildings that clutter up and spoil the scenic views. The traffic in my neighborhood is heavy and it is dangerous for the children going to school."—Barry, grade 5–6.

"DDT was the super bug killer, it was cheap and relatively harmless to man in its immediate, noticeable effects. But now it appears that the DDT family lingers in the environment, accumulates in soil, plants, and fatty tissues of warm blooded creatures and aquatic life. The heavy pesticide application causes more complex problems. Many Californians are injured by pesticides or other agricultural chemicals.—Terri, grade 5–6.

"I think that there are too many people. The more people, the more cars. And this brings up some big problems: smog, traffic, and air pollution. Because of the big increase of people there are more industries to pollute the air."—Mike, grade 5–6.

"It seems like we are sardines in a can, the houses are so close together and then you go into the city you are so crowded you can hardly move, it's horrible!"—Trudie, grade 5–6.

"A threat to nature
Many guises it assumes.
Progress is its name."—Tom Park.

"Another problem is greed! Nobody is satisfied with what they have. If we all worked together we could all be better off."—Worried.

"Sacramento is also feeling the effects of smog. During the burning of the rice fields that surround the city after harvest time is the time when it gets the most smog. Last year it was exceptionally bad because the winds brought the smoke and haze right into the city. Sacramento was left in a bubble of smoke. Cities like Los Angeles and New York may be too far gone but I hope Sacramento won't be."—Steven, grade 8.

"Scientists say that in Los Angeles children will not be able to have gym class, because they would breathe harder and need more oxygen, and there is not enough."—Carol, grade 8.

"Where is tomorrow? I think that's one question the youth of today want to know the most.

"When you sit down and read a book about long ago, you read about clear skies, clean lakes, large forests, and birds flying and singing above.

"Then you look outside. You hear noisy cars, see dirty streets, and breathe filthy air.

"So you ask an adult why hardly anything is being done about it and they say, 'Well, this is what comes with progress.' or 'It's those idiotic Democrats or Republicans back east who won't let the good bills pass in the congress or the senate.'

"Perhaps this is the reason why the youth of today are revolting. We're not satisfied with those answers. We want a better tomorrow! The type of tomorrow we want is one without air and water pollution, without racial prejudice or social injustice, without so many people! To do this we must have everyone's cooperation, but I believe in their hearts everyone wants a clean world."—Peggy Leichel, grade 6.

"When I grow up I hope pollution problems and wildlife problems are stopped so my children will not be ashamed of their country."—Danny, grade 4.

"I think that the water pollution problem could be helped in some places by enforcing the laws better. My generation are the people who are going to have to do something about these problems and I know that when I grow up I'm about to do all that I can."—Debbie, grade 5–6.

"If the government would ban off-shore drilling and build factories away from water it would help."—Pam, grade 6.

"I will not waste water."—Debbie, Tim, Matt, grade 1.

"We should not waste water, air or soil. We should turn the water off after using it."—Lori, grade 3.

"We could stop the pollution of air by stopping the burning of our leaves and garbage. Instead of burning leaves you could put them in the garbage can or plow them into the soil to make it fertile. Also it might help if they put some kind of device on cars to prevent so much smog. Also manufacturers shouldn't burn their wastes."—Jeanine, grade 6.

"Now if everybody would do their share by getting an electric engine when they come out, stop burning their trash, stop smoking, and write a letter to your congressman and ask him to do something about it, we would be better off and more healthful, too."—Patrick, grade 6.

"In my opinion the environmental problems are everybody's fault. Without thinking you start your car in the morning. Thus, by the simple turning of a key, you are adding to the smog."—Allen, grade 5–6.

"The silent calm night
Peaceful still and so quiet
If you're on the moon."
—Marcia Muggelberg.

"Garbage is not just a thing of the past; it's here and now. We should be able to invent a disintegrator for the disintegration of garbage. I wish people had enough sense to think ahead and clean up. We must save our species—civilization has left a trail of filth. I can't help but think what a beautiful world it must have been before people came. We must clean up this world so that there will be a world worth living in for our children and grandchildren."—Tammy, grade 5–6.

"What changes in my environment would change me? or maybe anybody? How often would you stop and pick up wrappers or cans lying around? How many people care about their environment? If we did little things to help, such as picking up our own garbage, keeping our property neat, throwing things in litter cans, wouldn't other people catch the idea and do the same? Wouldn't people be happy if their town was clean? Sure! Face up to it, people are too busy, or think they are, to do things for a better environment. But everyone can do things helpful! Why don't we all help? Come on let's change some habits and some dark moods to happy ones!"—Stacy, grade 6.

"People shouldn't treat their property disrespectfully. It's their country and if they want a clean one you mustn't litter."—Marty, grade 6.

"When you are out at the lake bring a sack or something to put your trash in."—Lisa, grade 3.

". . . use only things that can be used over and over again."—Terry, grade 5–6.

"Pollution is bad
We are losing the battle
Let's work together."
—Robert Trulock.

"We need forests for camping, hunting and timber. Don't start forest fire. We can do this by drowning out our camp fires. And take other safety precautions. There should be planned cutting and replanting so the lumber is not wasted.

"Engineers must keep up with new methods of road building and other projects and try to build roads on land not suitable for agriculture."—Karen, grade 6.

"We should be careful not to leave campfires burning because we might burn down the forest and destroy the animals' homes."—Kevin, grade 3.

"One way to stop the people from killing animals is to raise the fines higher and enforcing the laws."—Danny, grade 4.

"We should try to save our animals. Do not kill animals for no reason. Help sick animals."—Lisa, grade 3.

"Soil, too, needs help. Men are building homes and factories on very fertile soil and leaving the hard dry land for farming. In the hard land it is very hard to grow anything. To stop this from going any further we should give these men a bad time and get a better planning board in all the counties."—Patrick, grade 6.

"Soil should not be wasted by building factories on good farm land. Farmers should rotate crops every year so they don't use up all the minerals. We shouldn't go building roads on good farm land either."—Kristi, grade 6.

"There are so many environmental problems. The people who can really help are the congressmen. People should get together and do something about them."—Stephanie, grade 5–6.

"There are so many people who just throw the matter aside and say 'Our government will think of something to do.' Well this just isn't true . . . So what are we going to do about it? If everyone went around saying, 'Who cares?' or 'it isn't really all that serious,' we would end up wtih no one trying to help. So how about you and me doing all that we can to help. O.K.?"—Bobbie, grade 6.

"If we can start now, I think our children will see the future with beautiful plants and flowers, having love for animals and also love for being alive themselves. I think being alive is the most precious thing in the world besides love. We can't survive without either one."—Lily, grade 9.

". . . but it will take energy within ourselves to help ourselves instead of waiting for some genius to solve all our problems. Life isn't that simple. We have to change our mind and heart and stop talking and start 'doing'."—Shelia, grade 12.

"Keep our water clean
"Save our ancient forest trees
"Make our country shine."
—Nancy Patton.

"We will have to make better use of our environment so many people in the future can enjoy all the world's beauty and have good things to eat and drink."—Doris, grade 5.

"I would like to change my environment by cleaning up our surroundings. Many of us are not paying attention, but letting things die, be destroyed and wasting materials. Many of our old buildings and houses are being torn down. This does not have to happen. Certainly we can do something with old buildings. If we can't restore them, we can use the raw materials as glass or pipes, or, if there is furniture we could always repair the furniture and put it back on the market.

"Another thing which happens in school is we throw away paper just because we made a mistake. Probably many boys and girls do not know what paper is made of therefore do not consider it important if we waste a lot of it. If everyone threw away a lot of paper it would soon add up to quite a lot of lumber wasted and eventually our forests. I know of many things that are wasted and not used again as reusable resources. Almost everything can be used again.

"The main idea is we do not realize how lucky most of us are, and also, if we would share and give to others instead of taking everything for ourselves it would improve our environment."—Sandra, grade 6.

"Also, sometimes I think our country has too much money or else we spend it in the wrong places.

"We should ban DDT and all other dangerous pesticides."—Paula, grade 5–6.

"I feel population has a great deal to do with pollution. More people are dumping more and more pollutants in the same size environment. For example if there were less people there would be less cars to pollute the air.

"I think that if every two people would have only two children there would be a lot less pollution in the future. If people want big families they should adopt children."—Stephanie, grade 6.

"Land, water, and air are limited resources. Although our population has increased from 31,000,000 to 195,000,000 in 100 years, the supply of land, water, and air has remained the same. Unless we change our whole concept of the environment and unless we conserve our natural resources and use them intelligently, we cannot pass our civilization on the future generations."—Jeannene, grade 8.

"I think the people of Sacramento can clean up the pollution if they try."—Pam, grade 6.

"Everybody knows what people are doing to our environment. We all should know, too, that it has to be stopped. Most people are ready to do something about it but feel they're alone. They blame it on the guy next door or the politicians or the laws. The guy next door is probably as concerned as you. The laws are there. The politicians are doing something about it. We all must get together and stop it. No one person can do it alone."—Steven, grade 5–6.

"If more people wrote their congressmen or started groups or clubs things would start to happen. Who knows, someone might get a solution to end all our problems."—Karla, grade 5–6.

"Soil, water, and air
Can not stay fair forever
Without help from us?
—Brad Mishler.

"If we spent as much time cleaning up the garbage as we did rioting and protesting, we would have a pretty nice place to live. The United States is a good place, but we could make it better."—Carol, grade 8.

"Perhaps if we all became involved and acquainted with the facts the problem would be half solved. Now that I am acquainted with the facts, I will become a stronger anti-pollutionist. I see the extreme and immediate necessity of preserving the beauty of the world for the future generations. Are we so selfish and narrow minded as to prevent posterity from enjoying what we enjoy?"—Peggy, grade 11.

"Conservation has become an heated issue in which taxpayers are not stopping to consider the source of necessary funds while applauding legislators who vow to stop at nothing in waging all-out war against pollution. History has shown without doubt that any war must result in higher taxes if it is to be fought effectively and won."—Laurie, grade 12.

"Flowers grow today,
Front lawns are still growing grass,
Don't blink and miss it."
—KATHY CHARLES.

"Our land is not very beautiful anymore and when I get married and have children I don't want them to grow up in nothing but dense fog and smoke."—Robin, grade 6.

"Every person needs to see what he can do to help."—Sharon, grade 6.

"A POEM ABOUT AIR POLLUTION

"Air pollution is the thing, that flows in the air.
"It covers the city and causes a scare.
"I see it in the blue
when I am walking the dog.
"If we can only find a clue
To stop this smog."
—Andrew Hironaka, grade 3.

"Would you like to have
A conversation about conservation,
We don't want plants to look as ugly as a pig,
We want them pretty and big."
—Kimberli Luke, grade 3.

"We pollute the sea and air and never seem to want repair.
Pollution is no thing of joy
all it does is to annoy.
People want their clear, clean sky
but all they do is sit, not try.
What we need is good fresh air that we can breathe without despair.
If everyone would do their share
we could clean the dirty air."
—Lisa Vancavage, grade 4.

"Air, water and soil,
All we need to exist with.
How long will we live?
—Scott Matthews.

"The fog, the smog,
It's everywhere,
You ought to know by now,
It's been spreading all around,
And everyone knows how.
"It's been coming from our factories,
Cigarettes and cigars,
It's been coming from all the airplanes, and from the backs of cars.
"All the fog and all the smog,
It's been spreading through the nation,
It's been making people fight for breath,
And die of suffocation.
"So if someone doesn't hurry up,
and find a good solution,
All of us will surely die,
Of all this bad pollution."
—Dan Newman, grade 6.

"What's happened to our clear sunny waters
so sparkly and gay
And the bright clear skies I once saw every day?
Pollution! That is what happened, it's distressing to say
The water's all muddy, the sky is all gray."
—Coleen Goin, grade 6.

"Die! You insect pest!
We'll kill you with DDT.
Maybe ourselves, too?"
—Eric Carleson.

"Air pollution can be stopped,
So we can have clean air,
I wish you'd think of other people,
It just isn't fair.
"I'd stop it if I could, but I need you, you, and you,
To make this polluted world nicer to breathe in, and make
Some things illegal, like smoking or burning,
Help make new burning laws, that's all it would take.
"But I, can't make it illegal,
So you must act like it is that way,
To help end the air pollution,
That is in this world today."
—Toni Marie Tino, grade 6.

"Redwood trees are tall
At least it used to be so I'm not quite sure now."
—Rod Bittner.

"Pollution is in the air,
But it isn't really fair.
For the people who do it
Do not really care.
"Pollution is in the sea.
It really bothers me.
Do the people who do it
Know they are bugging thee?"
—Carrie Marshall, grade 6.

"The land is ruined,
They rob earth of her beauty
People are greedy."
—Renee Veitenhous.

". . . the wind blows
the river flows man lives animals try we make it harder for
to live on this earth
amen . . ."
—Bob Carlsen, grade 11.

"A BEAUTIFUL WORLD

"Let the forest be green,
Let the sky be blue,
Let the land be clean,
Let the water be clear,
Let the world be beautiful to everyone on it.
Let's both, you and I, keep this world beautiful."
—Peggy Betts, grade 6.

"Win a few
Lose a few
Who cares?
Why worry?
Won't be around when there's nothing . . .
No water to drink
No soil for food
No air to breathe
Enjoy yourself
while you can.
"Cough, Cough, gag
Get me out of LA
Send me somewhere
where I can get fresh air.
"Lungs full of muck with a little luck
I'll reach middle age.
Cough, cough, gag
Can't anyone see what is happening to me?
"Don't go to the moon
Stay home.
Help us clean up
Don't give up hope
Be a sport
It won't take long
Soil isn't bad
Water can be fixed
Air is fine
So come on back and join the crowd.
"Help! Help! Help!
Give me water
to quench my thirst
to bathe my swollen tongue to wash clean my bloodied throat.
Don't let me die!
Let me live!
Give me water,
fresh clean water.
"Love to eat!
Love to live!
Love to do many things!
Hate to suffocate . . .
Hate to starve . . .
Hate to die!
Won't you listen?
Can't you hear?
Don't pollute
Soil, water, and air.

"Poor young lady
Don't be silly
Water is water
What's the worry?
What can happen?
loads of water . . .

"Be a pig!
Be a litterbug!
This world's polluted . . .
What's a few

Air is bad
Water smells
Soil's dry.
Be a pig!
Be a litterbug!
Be like everyone.

"Earth!
Rich, moist earth!
Beautiful earth . . .
Pregnant earth . . .
Man and earth!
dull, dry, sad.
Barren and ugly
Poor poor earth
What's the matter?
Are you dying?

"Water, water, drink of life
Along with ambrose
Drink of the gods.
Along comes man whose greed is great whose carefree ways
Cloud the jewel of earth.
May a way be found
Soon, soon, soon.
Or the fountain of life
will be no more.

"Can it come to pass?
Are we to die
by our own hands?
The pollution of
Air, water, and soil
All is our doing
A race of gods
A doomed race
Unless they unite, for that is their weakness."
—Corinne Wong, grade 11.

"HELP

"I hate pollution don't you?
In the water all that goo,
And what about up on shore?
There's all that smoke and soot galore.
In water, land, and in the air,
Pollution is positively everywhere.
I will tell you anyhow,
Something's got to be done right now."
—David Jasinki, grade 6.

"AIR, WATER, AND LAND—WHY THEM?

"Is there change in the wind,
or is it death's ugly smell?
Is there peace in the water,
or is it death's ugly taste?
Is there food from the land,
or is it death's ugly poison?
Why them? Why them? Why them?
When will man realize,
When will man stop the waste?
Will it be too late?

INFORMATIVE SERIES OF ARTICLES ON PRISON REFORM

HON. WILLIAM L. DICKINSON

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to include in the RECORD a series of six articles written on the Nation's present system of corrections. I found the series to be extremely informative. In my opinion, the articles should be required reading for every lawmaker and every corrections official—arresting, attorney, judge, prison official—in the United States.

The six-part series is written by Robert Betts of the Copley News Service. It appeared as a daily feature in the Montgomery Advertiser, Montgomery, Ala., beginning Sunday, February 22, 1970, until conclusion Friday, February 27, 1970.

Mr. Speaker, the articles cover the failure of the corrections system to effectively succeed in rehabilitation, the futility experienced when attempting to offer treatment to recidivists or repeat offenders, the lack of funds and facilities, the lack of qualified personnel, and the lack of agreement on how best to utilize the available resources. They examine the philosophy of penology. The series attempts to answer the questions: "Is punishment still a dominant need for mankind? Does imprisonment deter? Prevent? Correct? Should prisons offer social protection and/or rehabilitation?"

In brief, the six-part series takes a hard look at these areas:

First. The divergent views of the philosophy of penology.

Second. The problems faced by corrections in dealing with the recidivist.

Third. An examination of the "model" facility—the Federal system.

Fourth. The State institutions.

Fifth. The local, city and county, facilities.

Sixth. Progress in prison reform.

I urge you to read this series. At times, you will be shocked but we must make the public aware of the deplorable conditions in many of our systems that have been produced in the name of corrections. Fortunately however, there are many bright areas in prison reform that can serve as the ideal example in improving our system of corrections.

In connection with this, I also recommend that everyone should read "The Summary of the Joint Commission Recommendations for Improving Corrections" written by Bill Andronicos for the Federal Times, February 18, 1970, which I am including in the RECORD today.

NO QUICK SOLUTION SEEN TO "EVERYBODY'S FAILURE"

(By Robert Betts)

A sweeping overhaul of the erratic, uncoordinated and confused system under which criminals are confined and treated in America will be attempted under a 10-year prison reform program called for by President Nixon.

The present corrections system, as the President has emphasized clearly, is failing to rehabilitate most prisoners.

No one, from the President on down, expects to find immediate solutions to a sweeping problem which one corrections official calls "everybody's failure," extending far beyond penal institutions. It is a hodgepodge system which daily must accommodate a half million criminals accused of everything from petty theft to murder.

The number of repeat offenders is a major dilemma.

Statistics show that nearly half of all those released from prison arrive back inside sooner or later for another crime, often more serious than the one which put them there in the first place.

Crime rose 120 per cent in the last decade, and much of it was committed by repeating offenders, known to prison authorities as recidivists.

Eight out of 10 offenders sampled in a recent Federal Bureau of Investigation study had at least one prior arrest. Seven of 10 had a prior conviction.

Of those charged with burglary, auto theft or armed robbery, between 60 and 70 per cent had been arrested two or more times in the preceding seven years.

The President said a nation as resourceful as the United States should not tolerate a record of such futility in its correctional institutions.

His reform plan calls for the establishment of a task force to make recommendations on a unified corrections system. Other recommendations now being worked on include:

1. Exploration of the feasibility of pooling resources of several governmental units—federal, state and county—to set up specialized treatment facilities;

2. Federal assistance to states and localities in developing parole and probation programs and other alternatives to incarceration;

3. Replacement of local jails with a comprehensive, community-oriented facility which would bring together a variety of detention efforts, adult and juvenile court diagnostic services and treatment programs;

4. Development of programs for juvenile offenders, who make up a third of all those under correctional treatment;

5. A major new research effort by the Justice Department into better methods of rehabilitation;

6. Coordination of all federal correctional programs by the U.S. attorney general.

The subject of prison reform has long been debated among sociologists, psychologists, criminologists, lawyers, politicians, police, prison and other government officials.

There have been hearings, investigations and official reports. Some grim pictures have been painted of confinement in the United States.

Many suggestions for improvement have been made. Some have been adopted. Others have been delayed for lack of funds, lack of qualified personnel, or lack of agreement on how best to use available resources.

At the root of the controversy is the whole philosophy of penology.

Agitation for prison reform is inspired not by humane considerations alone. Many reformers feel that recidivism is due as much to present modes of punishment as to any inborn criminal bent. Some contend that confinement in itself, apart from actual physical brutality and other evils which are said to sometimes accompany it, has a demoralizing , brutalizing effect on human beings, thereby increasing antisocial tendencies.

The National Council on Crime and Delinquency has raised such questions as: "Must the offender . . . be held isolated from society, or may he remain in the community of man? Is punishment still a dominant need of mankind? Does imprisonment deter? Prevent? Correct? Is the convicted criminal so much more dangerous than his nondetected or nonconvicted fellow man?"

The 1967 President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice stated: "The ultimate goal of corrections under any theory is to make the community safer by reducing the incidence of crime."

The fact that this goal seems to be receding rather than approaching, despite increasing emphasis on rehabilitation, has caused some to feel there has been too much "coddling" of criminals and that some criminals are incapable of ever being rehabilitated.

FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover believes, "Our patient public, ever willing to give a person who has breached our legal code of behavior another chance, has had its capacity for patience taxed to the ultimate."

There is the other point of view that modern society itself is to blame for its indifference to a "punitive and repressive" system which only leads to more crimes being committed.

A witness told members of one of the numerous Senate subcommittee hearings on prison conditions that public ignorance and indifference had made "the institutional setting a prime source of corruption, political intrigue and human degradation."

A confidential memo to a national foundation recommending a grant for a study of the U.S. correctional system declared: "Most of the recent attention to the criminal law process has been in the nature of a preoccupation with stopping crime and catching convicted criminals . . . Once a criminal is caught and tried and incarcerated, interest wanes . . . The general public seems to care little about prisons and prisoners, wrongly assuming that the issues they raise concern only questions of punishment or deterrence."

Dr. Karl Menninger, eminent U.S. psychiatrist and author of "The Crime of Punishment," believes there is a great public apathy to proposals for more intelligent control of crime and rehabilitation of criminals "because we have a persistent, intrusive wish for vengeance."

He argues that detention in prison, which "was supposed to be a modification of the infliction of pain," is often "more cruel and destructive than beating."

In his opinion, "Before we can reduce our self-inflicted sufferings from ill-controlled aggressive assaults, we must renounce the ancient, obsolete penal attitude in favor of a modern, therapeutic one."

Another well-known expert speaks in defense of punishment.

Dr. Ernest van Haag, sociologist, psychoanalyst and author of "The Fabric of Society," says, "People act when positive desire is stronger than the desire to avoid the cost. Accordingly, the crime rate itself rises if—for whatever reason—the impulse to commit crime rises and the average cost imposed by law is not raised with it, or is reduced. The crime rate falls when the impulse to commit crime falls, or the average cost imposed by law is raised."

One-sided emphasis on conditions which are said to produce propensity to crime, and undue neglect of costs to offenders, contribute to an unnecessarily high crime rate, he asserts.

Although he agrees rehabilitation is worth trying, he believes "the best of all rehabilitation programs is not likely to affect the rate of recidivism more than marginally."

Despite the poor rehabilitative results, the weight of opinion among prison and crime preventive authorities is for more research and experiment along those lines.

Hoover himself says: "Available crime statistics clearly establish a need for greater social action to prevent and abort more careers in crime, greater effectiveness on the part of law enforcement agencies in creating crime deterrents, and improved rehabilitation programs by the courts and correctional agencies."

ADEQUATE TO APPALLING; THAT'S QUALITY RANGE OF U.S. PRISONS

(By Robert Betts)

Recidivism—repeated criminal acts by the same offender—is the despair of the U.S. correctional system.

If the penal system could restore all or even most offenders to the community as responsible citizens, the national crime rate would drop significantly.

For a great many offenders, however, correction does not correct. The sad fact is that nearly half of them return to crime after their release, and the crime rate goes on soaring.

Some of those concerned with the problem are indeed coming to feel that the conditions under which many offenders are handled, particularly in institutions, are often a detriment to rehabilitation.

According to various investigators, the quality and conditions of the nation's custodial institutions—federal, state and county—range from adequate at best to appalling.

A parade of witnesses has painted a grim picture of confinement in all areas of the United States.

The Senate subcommittee on Juvenile Delinquency has heard prisons variously described as "crime hatcheries," "monster-producing factories," places which succeed only in turning out "finely honed weapons against society."

Subcommittee Chairman Sen. Thomas Dodd, D-Conn., was moved to comment, "We do better with our animals than we do with a lot of our human beings."

Four congressmen, members of the House Select Committee on Crime, who took a look at prison conditions in the District of Columbia in 1969, concluded that a man who walks out the gate after serving his time stands little chance of staying out.

Myrl E. Alexander, director of the U.S. Bureau of Prisons, told them, "The endless cycle of arrest, imprisonment, release and re-arrest has plagued our society. The time to interrupt this cycle is long overdue."

The 1967 report of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice stated: "Life in many institutions is at best barren and futile, at worst unspeakably brutal and degrading.

"To be sure, the offenders in such institutions are incapacitated from committing further crimes while serving their sentences, but the conditions in which they live are the poorest possible preparation for their successful reentry into society, and often merely reinforce in them a pattern of manipulation or destructiveness."

The report admits, "These conditions are to a great extent the result of a drastic shortage of resources, together with a widespread ignorance as to how to use the resources available."

There is also widespread disagreement, not only among correctional authorities themselves, but among lawmakers and penological experts outside the system.

There is little cooperation among federal, state and county authorities with a view to tackling the corrections problem on a nationwide basis. Each level of government often acts independently.

The federal government has no direct control over state corrections. The states usually have responsibility for prisons and parole programs, but frequently probation is tied to court administration as a county or municipal function.

Counties do not have jurisdiction over the jails operated by cities and towns.

The United States has more than 50 types of penal institutions. There are prisons with bars, prisons without bars, "halfway houses" (officially called Community Treatment Centers), rehabilitation homes with various probationary and psychiatric supervision schemes, special work projects and career training programs.

The nation's correctional system handles nearly 2.5 million admissions a year, and spends over a billion dollars doing so. On any day it is responsible for some 1.3 million offenders. Two-thirds of these are on probation or parole. The rest are under confinement.

Nine out of 10 prison inmates are men. About 60 percent are under 35 years of age. Over one-quarter are under 25, and about 10 percent are teenagers.

While some distinction between crimes is made for the purpose of incarceration, the present correctional method is criticized on the ground that too little consideration is given to the differences among criminals.

"Offenders themselves differ strikingly," the President's Commission stated. "Some seem irrevocably committed to criminal careers; others subscribe to quite conventional values; still others, probably the majority, are aimless and uncommitted to goals of any kind. Many are disturbed and frustrated youths. Many others are alcoholics, narcotics addicts, victims of senility, and sex deviants.

"This diversity poses problems for correctional officials, for in most places the many special offender groups must be managed within large, general purpose programs."

Prison authorities generally concede that there are obvious deficiencies in the system. Not the least of their problems are overcrowding, understaffing and lack of funds needed to modernize institutions, to recruit and train more staff and to introduce recommended reforms.

About 121,000 persons are employed in the corrections system. Although rehabilitation is considered the primary task (the aim being to see that lawbreakers, after once coming under control of the system, do not return to crime), only 20 per cent of the corrections personnel are concerned with treatment and rehabilitation. The other 80 per cent are responsible for maintenance and custodial functions.

The president of the American Correctional Association, Ellis MacDougall, said prison administrators lack basic and necessary tools. But he also charged that the institutions were being made scapegoats for "everybody's failure."

"We have the failures of the schools," he said, "the failures of our families, our churches, of mental retardation programs . . . We deal with everybody's deficiencies."

The President's Commission pointed out: Corectional agencies across the country face acute shortages of qualified manpower, especially in positions charged with responsibility for treatment and rehabilitation.

"Thousands of additional staff are required now to achieve minimum standards for effective treatment and control. Many more thousands wil be needed in the next decade."

HELPFUL WORK FOR INMATES IS BIG PROBLEM IN PRISONS—CORRECTIONAL INSTITUTIONS TEND MORE AND MORE TO HAVE OPEN DORMITORIES

(By Robert Betts)

"Prison is no picnic," said the warden, sticking his fork into a hamburger cooked by an inmate.

It was lunchtime at the Federal Correctional Institution on Terminal Island, Calif., near Los Angeles.

In the prisoners' mess hall next door to the staff dining room the inmates were eating basically the same food.

It wasn't food that the warden was talking about, but life for prisoners generally.

Everybody knows how tough it is, even if they've never been inside: all those bars, hard beds, stern guards, no privacy and, worst of all, no freedom.

But outright brutality?

"We're long past those days," said the warden, Greig Richardson, who is chief administrative officer at Terminal Island.

Prison officers generally think the average American has a distorted view of prison—a popular picture of mutinous inmates rattling tin cups on cell bars or shooting their way out in a big break.

All was quiet in the cell block the day I looked in.

Prisoners, reclined on their bunks, reading or snoozing. Some stared stonily through the bars. A few nodded "Hi." But most didn't bother even to look up.

These were the "close custody" inmates—new arrivals undergoing a 30-day admission process, transferees from other federal prisons finishing the last few years of a long-term sentence, and a few difficult ones who were not considered fit to mingle with the general prison population.

Most of the 790 men sleep in open dormitories with an average of 62 men to a unit. With their rows of neatly made beds and lockers, the dormitories could have been sleeping quarters in any Army barracks. Each has an adjoining recreation room where the inmates can watch television till 11:30 p.m.

Two units of 78 single rooms, which once were cells, have been converted to honor dormitories for trustees and others considered to have made outstanding adjustments.

Terminal Island is a "medium security" institution. It may not be the "ideal" prison, if such a place could ever exist. At least it presents the modern example of what the Federal Bureau of Prisons is trying to achieve in fulfilling the dual function of social protection from, and prisoner rehabilitation of, the men and women in its custody.

"The harsh abuses of punishment which have characterized many prisons in the past and which have served only to degrade and brutalize the prisoner have never been part of the program at Terminal Island," said Richardson. "In fact, for many years, corporal punishment of any kind has been totally outlawed in all institutions of the federal prison system.

"So far as possible, Terminal Island is individualized. There are few written rules. Rather, an attempt is made to formulate a wholesome and flexible structure of communal living."

In the main mess hall—no drearier, even brighter than some service and works canteens—inmates lined up at the service counters and seated themselves with their food at tables for four. One or two guards stood, armed with no more than a bunch of keys. Only the guards in the two watchtowers are armed.

Outside in the large central square, men strolled in the lunchtime sunshine or sat around laughing and chatting. Others were playing handball, badminton, horseshoes or lifting weights. There are also basketball and softball games.

"One of the greatest problems faced by most penal and corrections institutions is that of providing constructive work for the inmates," said Richardson.

At Terminal Island the work program takes precedence over all other demands upon the inmates' time. They work in the furniture refinishing shop, upholstery department or metal equipment factory turning out products for other federal departments. Training also is given in plumbing, carpentry, masonry, electrical work and other skills. In the women's section vocational training is given in dressmaking, cookery, cosmetology, hospital and office work.

The 1965 Prisoner Rehabilitation Act sparked a minor revolution in federal penology by authorizing the daytime release of prisoners for work or study in nearby communities.

Currently some 35 Terminal Island inmates—the figure varies as men become eligible—are traveling to jobs outside and returning to prison after work. They walk to nearby bus stop to begin their halfway journey into society. Each is provided with a prison lunch—two sandwiches, fruit and a slice of pie.

Eligibility requirements for work release are high. The prisoner must be within six months of completing his sentence. His offense and adjustment to prison life are taken into account.

"We have had very few failures," said Richardson. "One or two failed to return, but were picked up again. One was brought back by his parents. They had persuaded him it was in his best interest in the long run.

"Another had a drinking problem. He came staggering back one night—but at least he came back.

"The support from everyone—the police, civic groups, employers—has been great. Many men have carried on in their jobs after release and turned out to be good workers, well thought of by their employers. The old reluctance to employ exprisoners is dying."

Money earned by prisoners working inside or outside the institution goes to support their families, for transportation and clothing. Savings go into a trust fund established by prison officials. At the commissary inmates may buy cigarettes, candy and over 150 other items. Profits from commissary operations are used for providing television sets, motion picture equipment, prizes for special recreation events and the like.

The education department has a well-stocked library of fiction, non-fiction, standard reference works and books in various technical fields. There are teaching machines where prisoner-students sit at individual desks pressing buttons and watching a lighted panel as they conduct their own individual study program. Courses enable an inmate to obtain a certificate in elementary or high school level achievement. Special courses in the trades and professions are available from the International Correspondence Schools.

Said Warden Richardson, who has been 25 years in the prison service, "Prisoners cannot be stereotyped like you see them in the movies—all-smart and thoroughly evil or all-dumb and talking by the side of their mouths. They're all individuals, as varied as people outside.

"Neither is it possible, with our present knowledge, to predict their future behavior with any certainty. I've seen men leave here who seemed reformed and ready to start a new life, only to have the disappointment of seeing them back in prison before long. On the other hand, where I would almost have gambled on a man landing back inside, I have learned that he has completely turned over a new leaf, is going straight and making good."

Richardson agreed that certain types of crime have a higher repetition rate—such as "paper-hanging" (forgery) and auto theft, probably because they are easier to commit, less dangerous and comparatively harmless, at least in the criminal's view.

Narcotics addicts are another problem. Terminal Island has a special research program aimed at the treatment and social rehabilitation of addicts. It claims 35 per cent success so far.

"Recidivism is a subject that no one can be dogmatic about," Richardson said. "It is a hazy, controversial subject. Recidivism rates vary from prison to prison and there is no one set of figures applying to the whole country.

"Much more research and elevation are needed. It is not enough to know that a man has been returned to prison. We need to know whether he committed a new crime or violated parole, what his previous prison or probation record was, the types of rehabilitation programs he participated in, how serious was his crime or his parole violation.

"It takes time and the efforts of many more people than we have at the moment to accumulate, tabulate and evaluate this information. It also takes cooperation and coordination between the various correctional authorities across the country.

"We need a central information base which will give all the data on offenders and their background.

"Much progress in prison reform has been achieved over the last few years, but we still have much to learn."

SAN QUENTIN: "DOING OUR BEST ON LIMITED BUDGET"

(By Robert Betts)

California not only boasts sunshine and good living, it has the best prisons.

So officials in and out of the state claim. Not all prisoners may agree.

At grim old San Quentin, for instance, they grouse about the food, the crowded accommodation, the guards, the routine and regimen, the monotony of it all.

There are even complaints about the rehabilitation and vocational training programs, which apparently don't come up to the expectations of some people, in and out of the prison system.

Officials admit there's room for improvement.

"We're not trying to whitewash this place," said a San Quentin officer, "but we're doing the best we can with a limited budget."

Still, most penologists—in the federal system as well—acknowledge California to be one of the, if not the most advanced state as far as corrections go.

The state's Department of Corrections officials say that one advantage is having 13 institutions which affords more opportunity to segregate the hard-core criminal from the first-time offender. There is extensive shifting of inmates from one institution to another as their personal conditions change.

Nearly half the state's 27,500 prisoners are in minimum security—no bars, no high walls, no gun towers.

The department operates a number of minimum security conservation and highway camps, ranches and farms for specially selected inmates. About 2,500 of them live in forestry-conservation camps, working on firebreaks, fighting fires, helping conserve the state's natural resources and saving California taxpayers millions of dollars.

The California Institution for Men at Chino, opened in 1941 as the first open minimum security facility, became the model for similar institutions throughout the world. "A bit less pleasant and it might pass for a military base," commented one visitor.

At the institution's Tehachapi branch an experimental family visiting program is being conducted. This year about 200 inmates will be able to spend weekends with their families in specially provided apartment units.

California operates a number of programs to prepare prisoners for release. One is the 72-hour leave. Within 90 days of release, a prisoner is given 72 hours freedom to visit his family, interview for a job, obtain a driver's license, check with his labor union, and take entrance exams if necessary for future employment.

Another program is the work-furlough, under which some prisoners work at jobs on the outside during the day and return to the prison at night. One recent prisoner at San Joaquin County Jail was in the aircraft sales business, spent his work furlough flying charter planes, returning to the lockup after landings.

About 900 prisoners went from work furlough to parole last year.

Through a program of intensified parole supervision concentrated on the tougher cases, California claims to have cut its recidivism rate from 45 per cent, before the program was begun in 1965, to 32 per cent. Of these only 14 per cent committed new felonies.

Roy K. Procunier, director of the Corrections Department, said: "We need to continue the effort to develop strong community-based corrections programs such as intensive parole supervision, halfway houses and work furloughs. These programs provide an alternative to long and costly incarceration, and appear to offer the best hope for breaking the too frequent cycle of crime and confinement."

California's more liberal approach to corrections is being adopted in more and more states.

The work furlough program is now used in 24 of them, as well as in the federal prison system. In fact the idea was first tried in Wisconsin in 1913.

It was introduced in California in 1957 when legislation provided for inmates of county jails to go out to work. In 1965, additional legislation was passed under which selected prisoners from state prisons could join the county-administered program. The same year the work-release program was introduced into the federal prison system under the Prisoner Rehabilitation Act.

In North Carolina, where 12,000 select convicts have earned $10 million in 10 years, inmates are eligible for work release when they have served a relatively small portion of their sentences. Cancellation of work release for serious misbehavior—generally absconding—has occurred in 15 per cent of the cases.

Revocation has been lower in the federal system, where prisoners usually enter work release approximately six months before their expected parole date.

As of Jan. 1, Illinois has a separate Department of Corrections and Department of Law Enforcement, both operations of which formerly came under the one Department of Public Safety. Work release, halfway house and other rehabilitative programs are being expanded and corrections personnel increased.

"Illinois is not going to continue to run the kind of dehumanizing prisons which have created the present cycle of despair and human failure," promised Illinois Gov. Richard B. Ogilvie.

While some prisons have earned praise as well-run institutions with modern rehabilitative processes and splendid treatment programs, others have been the subject of scandalous revelations.

One of the most notorious recently (1968) concerned the Arkansas state penal system. A former superintendent told Senate investigation subcommittee that Arkansas prisons were festering with "inmate abuse and official corruption including death, threats, shooting of prisoners, gratuitous beating with rubber hoses, blackjacks, brass knuckles, ax handles, torture, stompings, lashings, kickings, sexual perversion and other forms of punishment." He also contended that he dug up bodies of inmates he believed were murdered by guards.

Arkansas Gov. Withrop Rockefeller instituted major penal reforms, including appointment of a new superintendent.

As to the theory that confinement in itself is a "brutalizing process" and that prisons can only serve as "graduate schools in crime," opinion varies widely, even among prison officials.

Superintendent of Illinois Prisons Hollis McKnight does not believe they are.

He pointed out that in his state an illiterate person entering the Illinois prison system could by the time of his discharge have earned an associate of arts degree or could have learned any of 54 different trades taught in prison.

"We seldom hear of the man on the outside who makes good," McKnight said, "because he isn't likely to publicize the fact that he has been in prison."

Paul Gaither, sheriff of Potter County in Amarillo, Tex., for 21 years, does not believe prisons are a "brutalizing process" either, though he agrees they are "graduate schools in crime."

Vocational training programs might help a prisoner "if he'd go out and find himself a job, but most of them won't do it," he said. "That old saying, 'Crime doesn't pay' is not true. It does pay."

The nearly half of released convicts who land back in prison "don't regret going back to the pen today," Gaither said. "The first offender is scared, but the second and third timers don't mind going back at all. They say, 'We've got it made when we get back.'

"I've taken men to the penitentiary, and on the way they'll be talking to each other about when they get out, and they can almost tell you the date. The prison authorities want to get rid of them as fast as the criminals want to get out. Facilities are crowded."

Texas, which has about 12,000 prisoners for 18 prison units, is rated with California as one of the better state penal systems. It boasts a remarkable six-week course at a relaxed center near Houston, where civilian volunteers including bankers, auto salesmen, and personnel experts, lecture felons on how to obtain loans, buy cars, apply for jobs.

"Even the prisoners now call Huntsville (state penitentiary) the "Summer Resort," said Gaither. One prisoner told him, "If Huntsville is like it was when I was there before I'd break away from you. You'd have to kill me before I'd let you take me back. But now I don't mind. I've heard how it is there now."

Many penologists believe that the percentage of those prisoners who cannot be reformed is very small.

Gaither thinks the figure is nearer one in a thousand. "If criminals never think anything very tough is going to happen to them when they commit a terrible crime, what is the deterrent?" he said.

"I hate to say it, but in the United States we've been too easy on criminals after they get in the pen."

Arnold Pontesso, director of the Oklahoma Department of Corrections, said that after a person has been committed to prison three times, "He's OK—he's where he is comfortable and has no worries—sort of like being on welfare. When he's released, it's like a vacation. He gets out, has a little crime spree and then, goes back 'home.' "

LOCAL FACILITIES WEAK LINK IN CORRECTIONS SYSTEM

(By Robert Betts)

No part of U.S. corrections is weaker, according to critics of the system, than the county jails and other local facilities which handle persons awaiting trial and serving short sentences.

Because the inmates seem to present no clear danger to society, the response to their needs may be one of indifference.

Turnover at city and county jails across the nation is around 1.1 million annually.

Classification of prisoners as to their danger to other inmates or need for counseling has been found often to be perfunctory or nonexistent.

First offenders, juveniles, women, even those awaiting trial who may be innocent, are imprisoned with confirmed criminals, drunks and mental defectives.

Such institutions are usually administered by police or county sheriffs, enforcement authorities whose experience and concern are mainly in fields other than prisoner counseling or rehabilitation. Neither have they the time nor the staff qualified to handle these added duties.

Yet it is here, at the primary level of confinement, that such work is most important, say prison reformers.

In its 1967 report to the President's Crime and Delinquency Commission, the National Council on Crime and Delinquency suggested that definite steps should be taken to improve conditions in local jails.

The report quoted penologist Louis Robinson who said a half century ago: "From many points of view, the jail is the most important of all our institutions of imprisonment. The enormous number of jails is alone sufficient . . . to make (one) realize that the jail is, after all, the typical prison in the United States. From two-thirds to three-fourths of all convicted criminals serve out their sentences in jails.

"But that is not all. The jail is, with small exception, the almost universal detention house for untried prisoners. The great majority, therefore, of penitentiary and reformatory prisoners have been kept for a period varying from a few days to many months within the confines of a county or municipal jail . . . Important witnesses also are detained in jail, and it is used at times for still other purposes, even serving occasionally as a temporary asylum for the insane."

The Crime Council's report states, "Now, in the seventh decade, this statement by Robinson and his comments on filth, neglect and maladministration still accurately describe the role and status of jails and short-term institutions in the United States."

The council believes that because jails are at the beginning of the penal continuum, they offer perhaps the "great opportunity to restrain the offender from descending down the ladder to maximum security facilities."

It states, "The availability of qualified services at this point could result in promptly removing many from the correctional process who have been swept in unnoticed and undetected and who are more in need of protective, medical and mental care from welfare and health agencies than they are in need of custodial care . . . "

Originally intended to be short-term holding operations, county and city jails have had to cope with a growing backlog of cases awaiting court action. Unsentenced local prisoners are therefore being held much longer than normal.

Bulging local facilities have been described as nests of "rampant vice."

A Philadelphia judge, releasing without bail a 20-year-old accused car thief and check forger, said, "Even if he's guilty, it would be a greater crime to keep him in prison than to allow him to repeat the offense."

The youth was said to have been a victim of repeated homosexual rape while held in pretrial custody.

In Washington, D.C., where homosexual attacks have also been revealed in city prisons, a federal judge refused to send four youths to a workhouse to serve five days for contempt because he did not want to subject them to "sexual molestation in the workhouse."

Such assaults are common in many local jails, authorities say. "It's a result of warehousing a hodgepodge of prisoners in antiquated prisons where they have little or nothing to do," said E. Preston Sharp, secretary of the American Correctional Association.

The Cook County Jail in Chicago, described by one official as "a great big human warehouse," was rocked in 1967 by revelations of corrupt guards, homosexual assaults, murders of inmates and strong convict control within the prison. A new warden was appointed, a $9-million bond issue was passed to finance jail improvements, 60 per cent of the guards were replaced and guards' salaries were increased.

Testifying before a House Appropriations subcommittee recently Herman G. Mueller, acting director, Bureau of Prisons, said:

"The condition of the more than 3,000 local jails in the United States, without question, contributes directly to the crime problem. For more than half a century little has been done to use the jail as a correctional institution. They have meager, if any, diagnostic and treatment programs. Personnel are untrained and generally underpaid. Most jails serve largely as warehouses and crime factories—places where impressionable young offenders learn ways of crime."

Some authorities have moved ahead to improve local conditions. Bucks County Prison, 25 miles north of Philadelphia, recently has been developed into what many experts consider a model jail despite the forbidding exterior of its 85-year-old structure. More guards have been hired and at higher pay. An inmate-screening system assigns all prisoners to work or training programs within 24 hours of their arrival. There is a work release program. More than a third of the inmates attend education classes—one of the highest levels in the nation's prisons.

Multnomah County, Ore. (Portland), is among the jurisdictions which have established special facilities as an adjunct to their county jails. The program includes work, counseling, tutoring by college student volunteers, corrective surgery and dentistry.

San Diego County Jail, Calif., boasts some of the most up-to-date facilities in the country—computerized processing, closed-circuit TV to keep surveillance over all strategic points inside the building, plate glass windows instead of bars in the reception wing, piped-in music, medical and dental clinics, as well as advanced rehabilitative and job placement programs.

"It does no good to keep people merely locked up," said jail administrator, Capt. John F. Duffy. "We have to pay regard to their personal problems and needs. Some need job training. Some are already skilled but have for some reason lost their self-confidence or self-respect. They need encouragement to point them in the right direction.

"We have the cooperation of several local welfare organizations who send volunteers to work inside the jail. With the help of volunteer students and professors from the University of California we are conducting our own drug rehabilitation program, to try and do something about the increasing number of young drug offenders."

Another recent innovation at San Diego, designed to speed up inmate release, is the acceptance of checks, money orders or credit cards in lieu of cash as bail for prisoners.

The county has established five camps to which prisoners sentenced to the jail are transferred after screening.

Separation and detention facilities for juveniles was one of the recommendations of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice. It also recommended that local jails and misdemeanor institutions be integrated into state correctional systems.

Arnold Pontesso, director of Oklahoma's Department of Corrections, believes the influence that the more sophisticated corrupt individuals exert over beginners is one of the chief causes of recidivism.

Pontesso, a former warden of the federal reformatory at El Reno, Okla., is very correction-minded and seriously concerned with rehabilitation.

"We're trying to take first termers, and at least part of the second-termers, and keep them from becoming professional convicts," he said. "If we have a better means of separating the starters, I think we'd have a better success."

PRISON REFORM HAS COME LONG WAY, STILL MORE TO DO

(By Robert Betts)

Prison reform has come a long way since Benjamin Franklin and his friends founded the Philadelphia Society for Alleviating the Miseries of Public Prisons. But many penologists today consider it hasn't come far enough.

Philadelphia's 18th Century Quakers rejected execution, torture, flogging and other corporal punishment as a way of dealing with offenders. Solitary confinement until death or release was more human treatment, they believed.

They also introduced the notion of labor as a necessary part of penance. Visitors from Europe were amazed at what they saw in Philadelphina's new stone penitentiary—inmates working at carpentry, weaving, shoemaking. Some prisoners even slept in dormitories.

The reform movement spread, but slowly. Each state set its own standards, and some were more progressive than others.

In 1831, historian De Tocqueville wrote, "By the side of one state, the penitentiaries of which might serve as a model, we find another whose jails present the example of everything which ought to be avoided.

In the opinion of the National Council on Crime and Delinquency these words "need not even be paraphrased to describe accurately the uneven quality of prisons in the United States today."

According to council director Milton G. Rector, it is impossible to give a black and white, yes or no answer to the question of whether the states and other jurisdictions are doing their best to improve correctional care.

"Some are in the dark ages, but others follow enlightened policies," he said.

As reforms have been introduced so has the whole correctional system become far more complex. Correctional authorities across the country, already working on a limited budget and lacking qualified personnel, have been called on to provide a wide range of extra services mainly connected with rehabilitation—educational programs, work programs, vocational training schemes, counseling and various forms of medical and psychiatric care.

Attempts to improve prison atmosphere have resulted in notable changes in the physical features of many federal and state institutions. Barred cells have given way increasingly to rooms or dormitories with locked doors and windows. Dreary mess halls have been brightened up. The old long wooden tables and benches have been replaced by separate tables.

Fences rather than high walls and gun towers now surround many modern institutions, other than maximum security prisons. Prison grounds have been replanned with gardens, sports and recreation areas. Theaters, hobby and handicraft rooms, classrooms, workshops, vocational training centers and other facilities for the recreation, instruction or rehabilitation of inmates have been added, expanded or modernized.

Progress has not uniform or free from complication. Legacies from the old days still exist in much prison architecture—grim and fortresslike, with tier upon tier of individual cells arranged chiefly with a view to security.

More than a score of U.S. prisons are over 100 years old, beyond replanning on modern lines.

Neither are public funds for prison improvement easily obtainable.

"Many people feel that spending money on better jails amounts to coddling prisoners," commented Philadelphia District Attorney Arlen Spencer.

Many institutions, especially those for juveniles, have taken on more social workers, counselors, psychologists and teachers to aid in the rehabilitative process. Modern reformers who would like to see much more rehabilitation work being done complain that there are not nearly enough of them.

Another criticism is that the majority of prison custodians are unfamiliar with institutional care or do not get the on-the-job training which could improve their capability in keeping with the shift of emphasis from simple restraint to rehabilitation.

"We don't pay our people well enough to have them capable of being counselors," said Arnold Pontesso, director of Oklahoma's Department of Corrections. "Most of them are guards, regardless of what we call them."

Starting salary for a prison guard in Oklahoma is $350 per month. Requirements are an 8th-grade diploma and, says Pontesso, passing "a very simple test and being warm. Zoo keepers make more money starting with no experience."

Some states pay their guards more. Illinois offers $415 per month to start, but makes it $482 at the maximum security Joliet facility. The base for a correctional officer in California is $545.

Qualifications for prison personnel also vary from state to state. In some there is no basic educational requirement for guards.

Louisiana State Warden C. Murray Henderson, responsible for the once-notorious Louisiana State Prison at Angola, said "We would like to require a high school education or at least the G.E.D. (general education degree), but we probably wouldn't get enough guards if we did."

The shortage of guards at Angola is such that inmate trustees are utilized when necessary, a practice Henderson regards as "most undesirable." The practice, however, is not unusual in U.S. penal institutions.

As for being qualified in rehabilitation work, a report prepared for the President's crime Commission stated that in 28 per cent of the prisons "one can be a 'professional worker' without having graduated from high school. In at least one (prison system) the mail clerk is called a social worker."

One of the nation's foremost pioneers of prison reform, Joseph E. Ragen, who as warden transformed Joliet-Stateville, Ill., state prison from anarchy to a model correctional institution in the 1930s, confirmed that the key to carrying out rehabilitation in prison is having qualified personnel to teach and train convicts. He regrets the lack of competent custodial officers, but sees little that can be done about the problem so long as state legislatures refuse to pay the bill for such a purpose.

"You can't get the right kind of help unless you pay for it," he said. "Society pays one way or another for crime. The offender goes to trial and the taxpayer is faced with the burden of supporting him when he is sent to prison."

It costs around $10 a day to keep a person locked up in a federal prison.

One way of cutting the cost is to put fewer offenders behind bars and allow more to remain in the community under parole supervision and treatment. It is estimated to be 10 times cheaper than keeping a person locked up.

"Even allowing for the substantial improvements in salaries and personnel needed to make community programs more effective, they are less costly," stated the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice.

In fact there has been a recent trend toward more parole and probation rather than confinement, not merely for reasons of economy but because of the widening acceptance of the belief that incarceration is in itself an inhuman method which can do nothing to rehabilitate a person.

More and more judges, forsaking the old rule, "Let the punishment fit the crime" for the new maxim, "Let the treatment fit the needs of the offender," are putting defendants on probation rather than sending them to prison.

Of the 1.3 million people now under correctional authority two-thirds are on probation or parole.

"If judges are turning to probation increasingly," said Ellis C. MacDougall, president of the American Correctional Association, "an important reason is the conditions that exist in our prisons—along with indications that many more types of offenders can be helped by probation than once was thought possible."

Not all law enforcement authorities are enthusiastic about the trend, however.

In Chicago, the state's attorney for Cook County, Edward W. Hanrahan said: "There has been abroad in the land a trend toward much more leniency toward defendants, leading to a very large number of sentences of probation, both in state and U.S. courts.

"I think this trend is very harmful. Criminal prosecutions and indictments have lost a large part of their deterrence impact because offenders realize the likelihood of probation."

District Attorney James E. Hamilton of Imperial County, Calif., deplored "the practices of paroling hardened criminals who roam the streets and kill innocent people."

Federal Bureau of Investigation Director J. Edgar Hoover, long a critic of freeing men he thought were likely to commit more crimes, has drawn attention to the fact that "of 87,600 offenders convicted in 1966 and 1967, over half had received leniency in the form of parole, probation, supended sentence or conditional release on one or more occasions in their criminal career."

He deplores "attempts to justify the premature release on parole or probation of repeating offenders whose entire records emphasize utmost contempt for our legal processes." He says, "Such attitudes offer little comfort to the law enforcement officer who falls before the blazing gun of an unreformed parolee, caught committing yet another violent crime."

Questioning the attitude of some in authority that it is they who are taking the chance in granting parole or probation, Hoover said, "It appears much more reasonable to the average citizen that it is he, the possible victim of an unreformed repeating offender, who is taking the chance. Our citizens have simply become overwhelmed with what they consider unwarranted concern with the rights of repeating offenders. They demand a fair share of regard for the security of their families, themselves, and their homes."

Lately there have been signs that the Nixon administration may be putting a brake on the liberalization trend in the parole system, as part of its emphasis on law and order.

Earlier this year, President Nixon threw his support behind detention of more "hardcare" criminals prior to trial.

The U.S. Parole Board recently scrapped a year-old policy which had been designed to speed up the process under which convicts were to be considered for parole.

The number of parolees has dropped since Mr. Nixon's selection as Parole Board chairman, George J. Reed, took office last May. From May through October, latest period for which figures are available, the percentage of paroles granted to those eligible for them dropped from 39 percent compared with 44 percent during fiscal 1969.

Reed said that before returning to the board—he had held the same job under the Eisenhower administration—he reviewed with Attorney General John N. Mitchell the "alarming rate of increased federal parole failures."

The failure rate—parolees charged with violating terms of their freedom—hit an all-time high of 40.7 per cent in 1968. This, Reed noted, was the year after the number of paroles granted had climbed to a peak of 52.5 per cent.

Reed hopes to implement a complete revision of Parole Board workings "which will be more scientific in its decision-making process."

He said, "My intention of returning to the board was to increase its professional standards in decision-making to the end that the public is better served."

But it will be a long time before it will be possible to assess the ability of one man or one administration to influence or change a system which has evolved over 200 years of trial and error.

CORRECTIONS GOALS STILL FAR AWAY

(By Bill Andronicos)

(Summary of Joint Commission recommendations for improving the corrections system)

WASHINGTON.—The major problems facing corrections today have been caused to a large extent by complacency and ignorance about the volatile nature of social problems that have been left unattended too long.

This is the contention of Joint Commismission on Correctional Manpower and Training, Inc.

In a report titled "A Time to Act," the Joint Commission said that although some progress has been made over the years to arouse public interest and to remove corrections from the shadow of political patronage, "not nearly enough has been accomplished."

There are still far too many employes in institutions, probation departments and parole agencies, the report said, who are there not because they were educated and trained for particular jobs but because their appointments satisfied political needs.

The report adds that there also are far too many correctional workers who look for other kinds of jobs to satisfy economic and personal needs because they cannot earn a decent living in corrections.

Although the American public has never quite made up its mind as to whether it is more important to punish offenders, to protect society, by locking them up—or to try to change them into useful citizens, there is an increasingly growing awareness among the public of the need for rehabilitation.

Hence, reintegration of the offender into society is seen by correctional personnel as one of their major objectives.

But, seeing the objectives and carrying them out effectively seem to be two completely different things.

For one thing, there is still too little cohesion among correctional workers themselves—cohesion which could weld them into an effective force for advancing their programs and promoting corrections as a unified field of work.

Moreover, there is still insufficient federal financial support available to state and local correctional agencies, despite enactment of major crime and delinquency laws aimed at strengthening state and local criminal justice systems.

Actually, most levels of government in the United States operate some or all of the correctional programs. The federal government, for example, has institutions, probation and parole programs for offenders convicted of violations of federal law.

States, however, are the major employers in the correctional field, operating institutions, parole systems and probation agencies. Local governments, however, administer the preponderance of probation services.

Whatever the case, the complexity of the correctional scene in the United States today has raised a number of multiple problems. These include apathy, inadequate funding, piecemeal programming, insufficient opportunities for the professional and personal growth of corrections personnel, inadequate training and management development programs and a host of others.

On the heels of such findings, the Joint Commission warned that the correctional enterprise must immediately be accorded support commensurate with the magnitude of the task to which it has been assigned. Otherwise, says the report, society may have to pay an even greater price in terms of social and economic costs for keeping its offenders out of sight and out of mind.

Among other things, the Joint Commission stresses the need for greater involvement by the general public, academicians, legislative bodies, governors and others in the executive, and judicial branches of federal, state and local governments—who by virtue of position and power can significantly alter corrections' position on the nation's agenda of social concerns.

As a result of its three-year study—and upon completion of the compilation of the most comprehensive set of facts ever assembled on correctional manpower—the Joint Commission included in its report a host of recommendations which it feels will help bring about improvements in the field of corrections.

Here are some highlights from the summary of recommendations issued by the Joint Commission:

A comprehensive nationwide recruitment program using brochures, television, magazines and other mass media should be developed immediately. Recruitment should include efforts to expand opportunities for minority groups, younger persons, and women.

Patterns of supervision and administrative control must be constantly reexamined to guard against overly restrictive supervision of employes.

Corrections must make provision for greater advancement opportunities in order to attract and retain high quality personnel.

To encourage mobility, provisions should be made for relocation expenses of prospective employes at supervisory, middle-management, top-management and specialist levels.

Correctional agencies, especially those in the community should adopt more flexible work schedules in order to utilize better their manpower and facilities. A rigid nine-to-five office schedule is a needless contraint on personnel time. Greater latitude in scheduling such things as conferences, contacts, home visits and report writing can also result in a more meaningful level of service to offenders and the community.

The establishment of a national retirement fund, which would permit correctional workers to transfer from one jurisdiction to another without loss of pension rights, should be a major goal of every agency and association seeking the betterment of correctional services.

The age of entry into some correctional jobs should be lowered to 18. Many correctional tasks can be performed by persons at that age, especially when job assignments are coupled with agency training or are part of a work-study program. Consideration also should be given to a uniform mandatory retirement age of 70.

Inflexible height and weight requirements should be eliminated and replaced by appropriate physical examinations to assess physical fitness and agility required by particular positions in corrections. Persons with correctional vision and hearing defects should not be excluded solely on the basis of these conditions.

Correctional agencies should examine their hiring policies to maximize the potential of those with physical handicaps.

Modifications should be made in prevailing civil service and merit systems policies, including: Elimination of written tests for entry into correctional work except for those positions where tests can show demonstrable evidence of measuring capacity to perform the functions required; substitution of oral interviews and evaluation of work, educational life and experience as the basic screening device; and elimination of written tests for promotions, with greater emphasis on evaluative considerations of promotion review boards.

Legal and administrative barriers should be lowered to permit the hiring of ex-offenders in corrections, as well as in other governmental agencies.

Salaries, retirement plans and other employe fringe benefits should continually be assessed and efforts made to keep them in line with comparable positions in government and industry in the same geographical area. Annual cost-of-living increases should be made an integral feature of salary negotiations.

A top priority should be given to the education and training of correctional managers in the areas of collective bargaining and labor-management relations.

The undergraduate degree should become the standard educational requirement for entry-level work in probation and parole agencies and for comparable counselor and classification positions in institutions. Preferred areas of specialization should be psychology, sociology social work, criminology, criminal justice, education and public administration.

A career ladder, which affords an opportunity for those with high school education or less to enter the field and make their way to journeyman levels through a combined work-study program, should be adopted by the field of corrections.

The two-year community colleges should expand their programs for correctional personnel. These schools are an excellent resource for corrections, particularly in the development of special programs for custodial and group-living staffs, case aides and community aides.

Correctional agencies, community colleges, four-year colleges and universities, as well as private and non-profit organizations involved in the education and training of correctional personnel should seek funds from federal programs concerned with corrections.

A comprehensive educational financial assistance program should be established in an appropriate federal agency, as a means of providing support for persons in or preparing to enter the field of corrections. Such a program should include provisions for: Scholarships; fellowships; guaranteed loans; research and teaching assistantships; work-study program; educational opportunity grants for students from disadvantaged, low-income families.

A federally supported grant program should also be created to provide sabbatical leaves for correctional administrators so that they may attend a college or university full-time for an academic year, with salaries, tuition and other instructional costs provided.

Corrections should restructure its roles so that optimal use may be made of the training and skills brought to the agency by specialized manpower.

Graduate-level training should be encouraged and supported in the academic fields from which correctional agencies draw their specialized manpower. Also, correctional agencies should press for sufficient funds to purchase the service of specialized manpower.

Correctional agencies should adopt a multi-faceted research strategy which would include: In-house evaluation projects; collaborative research ventures with institutions of higher education, private industry, and non-profit organizations; and cooperation with national, regional and state efforts to disseminate research results. Greatly increased funding at national, regional, state and local level will be required to provide correctional agencies with an adequate level of research capability.

Correctional agencies should expand their use of volunteers.

Correctional agencies should reexamine their policies and practices regarding the employment of offenders and ex-offenders. Criminal records should not automatically prevent persons from being considered for employment in corrections. Increased experimentation is encouraged to delineate further the special contributions which can be made to corrections by those who have been through the system.

Staff promotional policies should be reassessed to place a greater stress on the possession of knowledge and skills in management processes.

Correctional agencies must develop—in conjunction with colleges and universities, as well as the private sector—a range of management development programs including degree-oriented course work in administration and management seminars, workshops and institutes.

The federal government should make funds available to states to finance management development programs. Similarly, states should subsidize management development activities in local jurisdictions.

Correctional agencies at all jurisdictional levels should adopt sound management development programs.

A network of national, regional and state training centers should be created to develop training programs and materials as well as to provide technical assistance and other supportive aids to correctional agencies. Such centers should stress manpower development rather than a limited definition of training—and should develop close working relationships with colleges and universities as well as with private training organizations. Federal and state funds are urgently required for the development and support of such centers.

Federal and state funds should also be made available to agency training units to provide for the purchase and lease of modern training equipment.

Whenever feasible, future correctional facilities should be located near centers of business, commerce and education in order to facilitate linkages between offenders and the community and its resources.

Correctional agencies should contract with schools of law and individual faculty members to conduct training programs, seminars and institutes for all correctional employes who work directly with offenders. This kind of training would include basic legal concepts of due process, offenders' rights and recent legal trends.

Correctional agencies should add legal specialists to their staffs, not only to serve as agency advisors but also to provide legal assistance to offenders regarding civil matters.

A model code of correctional procedure should be formulated and its adoption pursued. The code would provide the necessary guidance for correctional decisionmaking processes involving offenders. A panel to draft such a code should include judges, lawyers, correctional administrators, academicians and lay citizens.

Correctional agencies should utilize more fully the resources of private industry—particularly in such areas as management development, research, basic education and job training for offenders—and should encourage private foundations to take a greater interest in the problems of corrections and in the education and development of correctional manpower.

Correctional agencies should make a concentrated effort to inform the community at large—and community groups in particular—about corrections' goals, needs and problems, and enlist their cooperation in working together to create the social climate necessary for offenders to assume meaningful roles in society.

Correctional agencies at all levels of government should establish units of community relations and public affairs staffed with public information specialists, in order to provide for a free and constant flow of information to the public.

Among other things, the Joint Commission said that the fact that 73 per cent of all correctional personnel are employed by states, coupled with the increasingly important roles being played by state-level planning agencies in criminal justice and delinquency, makes state involvement crucial in the implementation of the commission's recommendations.

While much of what must be done to improve correctional services can be done by states, local governments and the private sector, the report adds, the major changes required to upgrade correctional manpower necessitate a greatly expanded federal role.

"The resources now available to this field are so limited that any meaningful effort to develop adequately trained manpower for corrections can come about only through broad, continuing federal commitment to correctional rehabilitation," the report says.

A number of federal agencies provide support for education, training, technical assistance, research and program operations to corrections and to those colleges and universities and private organizations closely allied with the field.

For example, the Departments of Justice, of Health, Education and Welfare, of Labor and of Housing and Urban Development, as well as the Office of Economic Opportunity, all have grant programs which directly affect corrections.

But in each instance, the Joint Commission said, the level of funding at which these programs are operating is far less than that which would be required to do an adequate job—and no one agency has the authority to coordinate the total federal effort in this field.

Hence, along with its other recommendations, the Joint Commission has urged the President—as a part of current studies regarding the reorganization of the executive branch of government—to consider the designation of an appropriate agency to oversee the total federal effort in correctional rehabilitation. The commission also urged Congress to create a Correctional Manpower Development Act to help marshal and coordinate the total federal effort in the correctional field.

POLITICAL JUDGES AT WORK

HON. JOHN R. RARICK

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. RARICK. Mr. Speaker, the other body is currently acting on a Presidential nomination to fill a vacancy on the Supreme Court. This matter being within the constitutional preserve of the other body, I have refrained from comment. However, an unfortunate and indeed sickening event, involving my own State, has entered into the matter, and I feel that it is necessary for me to point out some simple truths.

During the course of debate on S. 952, the bill creating some 54 new permanent "pork barrel" Federal judgeships, I called to the attention of the House—see the RECORD at page 7912—my personal knowledge of the activities of a Federal judge sitting in Louisiana, who knowingly and willfully violated a Federal statute to usurp jurisdiction over litigation then pending in the State court over which I had the honor to preside. I did not yesterday name the judge, but reading his name in the local newspapers in another and equally uncomplimentary context, I do so now.

John Minor Wisdom, elevated by Dwight Eisenhower from his political job as Republican national committeeman for Louisiana to the bench of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals—a bench which he has discredited since his first donning of the judicial robes—is the judge to whom I had referred.

As part of the vindictive Reconstruction legislation of the last century, the Congress provided for removal from State courts to U.S. district courts of both civil and criminal actions in cases where the defendant claimed that he was unable to obtain a fair trial and the full recognition of his constitutional rights in the State court where the action was pending. Due to the abuse of this removal procedure by defendants who were able to utilize the review of Federal trial court actions as a dilatory maneuver, thus defeating the ends of justice, the Congress in 1875 expressly prohibited review of U.S. district court remands to the State courts "by appeal or otherwise."

In such a case, at the request of James Farmer and other CORE defendants who sought to avoid in public trial where they would be required to testify under oath, John Minor Wisdom signed a stay order with the names of two judges not present, and in violation of the statute. He purported to usurp the jurisdiction of the State court by granting a prohibited appeal. It is of some interest that the legal brain behind this maneuver was the same Communist mouthpiece, William Kunstler, who has been receiving nationwide publicity lately. Kunstler had personally drafted as a part of the 1964 Civil Rights Act a provision to repeal the very law which Wisdom violated at his behest.

Now we find that overworked Judge Wisdom is lobbying here in Washington against the confirmation of an appointee to the Supreme Court. Without regard to the qualifications of the nominee, I question both the ethics and propriety of a sitting U.S. judge who endeavors to influence the Senate by widely publicized statements, ignoring its committees. He had the same opportunity as other Americans to be heard on oath. Neither is it the business of a Federal judge to thwart the desire of other colleagues of his bench to submit their views in a proper manner. It is most definitely not the business of any Federal judge to act in contravention of the Constitution, to alter the public policy of the United States, or to attempt to pack the courts by demanding a veto over nominees who do not meet his personal standards.

If Judge Wisdom wants to acquire the right to advise and consent to judicial nominations, he should first get elected to the body charged with that responsibility—an accomplishment which even he knows is an impossibility, because he could never win an election in the State where he is known. His contempt for the Constitution and the law is exceeded only by his contempt for the people of Louisiana.

It is appropriate for those interested in the removal of those elements which are polluting our judicial system to take a long and careful look at John Minor Wisdom, his conduct on and off the bench, and the evident improvement in the Federal judiciary which would immediately result from an empty chair where he now sits.

Pertinent news clippings are included in my remarks:

SECOND COLLEAGUE JOINS FOES OF CARSWELL

(By Spencer Rich)

John Minor Wisdom, a colleague of Supreme Court nominee G. Harrold Carswell on the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, revealed yesterday that he opposes Carswell's nomination and that he helped block a letter of endorsement from the entire Fifth Circuit bench.

Wisdom's position was made known in an interview with Carolyn Lewis of WTOP–TV, who reported that Wisdom said he had doubts about Carswell from the start and had warned other members of his court that he would send a letter of opposition of his own if his colleagues went through with a plan to send a letter of endorsement.

On Tuesday, Sen. Joseph D. Tydings (D.–Md.) revealed in the Senate that Judge Elbert Tuttle, also of the Fifth Circuit, had withdrawn his support of Carswell.

In a telephone interview with the Washington Post late yesterday, Wisdom said that he had never intended to endorse Carswell and confirmed that he had told WTOP–TV, "I stand with Tuttle."

The Senate completed its third day of debate on the nomination yesterday with a charge by Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.) that Carswell had violated three canons of judicial ethics through his "bias and hostility toward anyone arguing a civil rights case" when he was a federal district judge in Florida.

Cranston revealed the name of another civil rights attorney who accused Carswell of bias, Theodore Bowers of Panama City, Fla., whom Cranston said he had reached by phone. Bowers did not appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee during hearings on the nomination. Several other civil rights lawyers did and said Carswell showed bias against them and their clients.

Cranston said Bowers told him that between 1964 and 1968, when Bowers argued before Carswell, the judge was "hostile even over routine matters," turned away and didn't listen, "criticized Supreme Court civil rights decisions from the bench in the midst of hearings on a civil rights case," and "verbally attacked U.S. attorneys appearing in his court on civil rights cases, as well as private attorneys."

Cranston said this conduct appeared to violate canons 5, 10 and 34, requiring a judge to be temperate, impartial, courteous and above reproach in his conduct.

In other developments on the nomination:

Rep. Donald W. Riegle Jr. (R-Mich.) urged that the nomination be withdrawn or rejected, saying many saw it as part of a "larger strategy" against Negro rights which included a desegregation slowdown, attempts to weaken the 1965 Voting Rights Act and "the strident rhetoric of the Vice President."

Senate Minority Whip Robert P. Griffin (R-Mich.) predicted Carswell would be confirmed with at least 60 votes. He reaffirmed his support for the nominee, despite mail running "four or five to one" against him and despite a statement Tuesday from Michigan's Republican Gov. William G. Milliken opposing the nomination.

Sen. Roman L. Hruska (R-Neb.), a strong Carswell supporter, told the Senate he had not meant to call Carswell "mediocre" or suggest that mediocrity deserved representation on the court, when he told a broadcaster Monday, "Even if he were mediocre, there are a lot of mediocre judges and people and lawyers, and they are entitled to a little representation, aren't they?"

Sen. Mark Hatfield (R-Ore.), whose vote helped defeat the last Supreme Court nominee, Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., said he was leaning toward voting for Carswell.

"How many times can I vote against an ABM and a Haynsworth and still be in the ball game?" he said, referring to several votes in which he had bucked the President.

FLAG NAMED "OLD GLORY"

HON. DAVID PRYOR

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. PRYOR of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, on March 7, 1970, I had the privilege to participate in "Patriotic Day" in Pine Bluff, Ark. Several hundred students, faculty members, and local citizens, along with scouting groups and the American Legion officials, made this day a resounding success.

One of the many illuminating messages was delivered by Miss Sarah Lynnette Hartfield, a high school student in the Pine Bluff area. It presented some new thoughts concerning our flag and was entitled, "Flag Named 'Old Glory.'"

I submit Miss Hartfield's message for the consideration of my colleagues:

FLAG NAMED "OLD GLORY"

The name "Old Glory" was first applied to the United States flag by a young sea captain who lived in Salem, Mass. On his twenty-first birthday, March 17, 1824, Capt. William Driver was presented a beautiful American Flag by his mother and a group of Salem girls. Driver was delighted with the gift. He exclaimed, "I'll name her 'Old Glory.'" Then "Old Glory" accompanied the captain on his many voyages.

Captain Driver quit the sea in 1837. He settled in Nashville, Tennessee. On patriotic days he displayed Old Glory proudly from a rope extending from his house to a tree across the street. After Tennessee seceded from the Union in 1861, Captain Driver hid Old Glory. He sewed the flag inside a comforter. When Union soldiers entered Nashville on February 25, 1862, Driver removed Old Glory from its hiding place. He carried the flag to the Capitol building and raised it above the state capital.

Shortly before his death, the old sea captain placed a small bundle into the arms of his daughter. He said to her: "Mary Jane, this is my ship flag, 'Old Glory.' It has been my constant companion. I love it as a mother loves her child. Cherish it as I have cherished it."

The flag remained as a precious heirloom in the Driver family until 1922. Then it was sent to the Smithsonian Institution in Washington and there it is carefully preserved under glass today.

OUR FRIENDS—THE FARMERS

HON. DAVID R. OBEY

OF WISCONSIN

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I made a speech on this floor in defense of the American farmer. In my remarks I tried to point out the problems facing the family farmer today—inflation, a cost-price squeeze which shrinks, if not eliminates his profits, and recent policies of the administration which are proving to be of great disadvantage to our farm population.

In my remarks I also made a special appeal to my urban colleagues, asking them to give as serious consideration to solving the problems of our farmers as they ask all of us—and rightly so—to give to our cities and more metropolitan areas.

Last week, there appeared an editorial in an Allied Industrial Workers newspaper published in Milwaukee, Wis., entitled "Our Friends—The Farmers."

To quote directly from that editorial:

The fact is that both the family farmer—not including the new-fangled corporation style farms—and the worker face a similar fate of having to scramble hard to scrape together a living for their families.

This points out simply, I believe, the ties which truly exist between the farmer and the worker, those in our rural and those in our urban areas. It represents the kind of mutual understanding between urban and rural residents which I think we need.

Mr. Speaker, I commend this editorial to my colleagues and include it in full below:

OUR FRIENDS—THE FARMERS

For years, there has been a tendency to portray the worker as the enemy of the farmer and, conversely, the farmer as the enemy of the worker.

After all, the reasoning went, the wage increases bargained by workers increased the cost of equipment that farmers had to buy to till their land and milk their cows; and, the increasing costs of food could be blamed on the farmer and his prices.

Nothing could be further from the truth, but too often the family farmer and the worker both swallowed this hook, line and sinker.

The natural enemies of both groups are big business and big banks.

The high price of farm equipment, for instance, comes about despite increased productivity of workers. Figures show corporate profit increases of 93% after taxes from 1960 to 1968, while wage increases amounted to 35%.

And, food price increases cannot be blamed specifically on the farmer. He gets but 41c out of every dollar spent by consumers on food.

Furthermore, both farmers and workers are victimized by the high cost of interest. Farmers find their ability to buy needed farm equipment stifled because of high bank rates, and workers find themselves priced out of housing and other necessities by high mortgage rates.

The fact is that both the family farmer—not including the new-fangled corporation style farms—and the worker face a similar fate of having to scramble hard to scrape together a living for their families.

Too many workers have listened to the business-oriented press and have permitted a wedge to be driven between the worker and the farmer. Politically this fact has hurt by making most rural Congressmen antilabor.

This does not have to occur. Common sense dictates otherwise.

BLACK TRUCKER FIGHTS FOR RIGHTS

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, the story of only one black businessman's plight in this economy is soon to unfold before the Senate Commerce Committee—when Timothy Person, black trucker and constituent of the First Congressional District in Missouri—takes the stand. Mr. Person will relate the trials and tribulations of his attempts to secure licensing to engage in national interstate transportation of household goods. He has encountered only great difficulty trying to participate in the closed system and procedures laid down by the ICC.

More and more the suggestion to disband the ICC is heard. The agency designed to protect the public interest has evolved into a Government paid staff and mechanism for the perpetration and protection of certain private interests. There is no audience for the public interest in the ICC.

I commend to the attention of my colleagues the following comment carried by Jack Anderson who found the story of Timothy Person worthy of note. The following is taken from Mr. Anderson's column of March 20 which appeared in the Washington Post:

BLACK BIAS

A black trucker, trying to get ahead in the white man's world of long-distance hauling, has documented for a Senate committee how the federal government plays ball with white firms to exclude Negroes.

Timothy Person, president of Allstates American Van Lines, has turned his data over to the Senate Transportation subcommittee, now deep in a probe of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

This column has obtained copies of the data, including signed statements by ghetto dwellers who couldn't get the big national firms to move them. Person also has tapes, recorded in his office dictating machine, of the giant firms refusing ghetto business.

Yet the ICC has twice turned him down for a 50-state license, claiming there is no "immediate and urgent need for any of the service proposed" by Person.

A signed statement in the committee files from Queen Esther Fields of St. Louis disputes the callous ICC view. It claims that agents for Allied-General Van and Storage, Red Ball Transit, North American Van Lines and four other firms all gave her the runaround when she told them her address.

After a month and nine days, Person answered her appeal and moved her from St. Louis to Stockton, Calif. He has a license to operate in more than half the states, but must turn down jobs for others.

As a man who is making black capitalism work, Person is not asking for money, only a license to build his particular American dream.

PREVIEW OF TESTIMONY

The black fleet owner will testify later before the Senate committee, headed by Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.) An advance copy of his statement, obtained by this column, details his charges against the ICC, which makes a great public fuss of its "aggressive anti-discrimination policies."

States Person: "Out of approximately 15,201 total motor carriers in his country, there are 18 blacks with very limited authority. There are 4,000 household goods carriers (but) only 16 black carriers.

"There are 18 national household goods carriers but there is not one black national carrier. Out of the tens of thousands of local agents that represent major carriers as master agents there are less than a dozen blacks so fortunate."

Nevertheless, Person said, the ICC sided with the white transport tycoons, who "protested my application on the grounds that they have more than 54,000 (trucks) and because they felt that my 12 trucks would jeopardize their investments and business."

Person's unpublished statement pointed out that none of the ten presidentially-appointed ICC commissioners are black, none of the five motor carrier board members are black and none of the 101 district supervisors are black. In fact, the ICC's white face turned red with embarrassment when this column asked who the highest ranking Negro is. They found a black trial attorney in Boston.

"The ICC could hardly indict the trucking industry for discrimination when its own record in race relations is just as bad, if not worse," Person said in his statement to Hartke.

POLITICAL DEFINITIONS

HON. JOHN E. HUNT

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. HUNT. Mr. Speaker, the economic system characterizing our society and, indeed, a fundamental element of our way of life, is capitalism. It has withstood attacks, although in a weakened condition, from the radical left for many years. Although a hindrance to the New Left in the achievement of its revolutionary social goals, capitalism is the only system which both advances and thrives on individual freedom and liberty.

In this connection, several comparative and poignant political definitions were recently brought to my attention, and I include them following my remarks for your reference. Beginning with socialism and building to capitalism, all the definitions start with the premise that "You have two cows." I am sure you will agree that capitalism is the only system with the potential for yielding more than that with which you started.

The definitions follow:

Socialism—You have two cows. The government takes one and gives it to your neighbor.

Communism—You have two cows. The government takes both and gives you the milk.

Fascism—You have two cows. The government takes both and sells you the milk.

Nazism—You have two cows. The government takes both and shoots you.

New idealism—You have two cows. The government buys both, shoots one, milks the other and throws the milk away.

Capitalism—You have two cows. You sell one and buy a bull.

STOP THE DEMAGOGUERY—TELL IT LIKE IT IS

HON. GLENN CUNNINGHAM

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I am amazed at the many conflicting stories, inflammatory remarks, and pure demagoguery by various people relative to the postal strike. For that reason I wish to insert at this point in the RECORD a statement I made on Sunday, March 22, in Omaha, at the time the Omaha Letter Carriers' Union met to decide their course so far as whether or not they would strike. I am happy to advise that they voted against a strike by better than 3 to 1. But more importantly, there follows a story which was on the front page of last Saturday's Chicago Tribune, written by Russell Freeburg, and this is the story that I say tells it like it is. The statement and article follow:

WHOSE FAULT IS IT?

(A statement to Omaha letter carriers from Congressman GLENN CUNNINGHAM, a senior member of the House Post Office Committee, Sunday, March 22, 1970)

You have read many conflicting stories, many of them inflammatory and many of them written by reporters who don't know what they are talking about. We have a serious situation confronting us and all postal employees should think seriously as far as this issue is concerned. For 13 years I have championed the causes of all postal unions in bringing about salary increases, increases in fringe benefits and all things I knew were needed by our loyal and dedicated postal workers.

As you know, the strike began in New York City, and even though many of the postal workers there are militants and members of the radical Students for a Democratic Society, when the first vote was taken in one of the large Letter Carrier Locals in New York there was only a plurality of some 500 votes in favor of the strike, which, of course, you know is illegal and a violation of the Federal law.

However, strike actions have spread and evolved into a political issue. The President of the United States is being criticized for not granting salary increases. The fact is salary increases are out of the hands of the President and rest solely with the Congress.

I think almost everybody who receives mail admires his letter carrier, and many know him on a first-name basis. Because of this we have had public support from the postal patrons for the various salary increases and many fringe benefits which we have been able to effect in the 13 years that I have served as a member of the Post Office Committee, since I have been a member of Congress. Proof of this has been the testimonials given me by the Letter Carriers on various occasions in the Omaha area as an expression of their appreciation of my active support of their salary increases, improved working conditions, and many fringe benefits. I have been awarded by the Carriers a lifetime honorary membership card in the Omaha Letter Carriers Union.

I have been criticized through the years by the Omaha World-Herald for having voted for increased wages and fringe benefits for postal workers. But that newspaper has always opposed me and it did not bother me a bit because I knew what was right and what was the right thing to do.

Unfortunately, there is great rivalry among the postal unions, particularly between the Carriers and the Clerks. The Clerks have been exceptionally mean recently due primarily to the political maneuvering of Pat Nilan, the Clerks' Legislative Representative in Washington, and their National President, for the reason that Nilan is working as hard as he can in an undercover way to try to snatch the presidency of the Clerk's Union at their next national convention.

I left Washington, D.C., in the early morning hours this past Saturday in order to bring my family to Omaha so that they could be here for the Easter vacation and to allow me several days to take care of official business in my Congressional District. I am in constant contact with the Postmaster General and the White House in the event that I am needed there for any meetings, and although I had planned to stay here several days, I will drop everything immediately if I am called for any meetings on the postal crisis, and I can be in Washington within a matter of two or three hours.

I have been in constant telephone contact since I arrived in Omaha this past Saturday with the administration and postal officials, as well as the National Letter Carriers Union. In fact, I was on the telephone until 1:00 a.m. today, Sunday, and then snatched a little sleep and was again in constant communication beginning at 5:00 a.m. (C.S.T.) this same Sunday morning. In any event, in spite of all you have read in the newspapers by inexperienced or ill-informed reporters, when I stopped over in Chicago at O'Hare Field yesterday (Saturday) I picked up a copy of the Chicago Tribune and read a front-page article written by Russell Freeburg, who is the correspondent in Washington for the Tribune. He is an outstanding journalist, knows exactly what is going on and what the true facts are. In this article (identified as a "News Analysis") it carries the headline: Postal Reform Bills Stifled by House and Senate Leadership. This article tells it exactly as it is. It is the fault of the Congress that we have this situation today. I, as a member of the House Post Office Committee, have worked many long hours for many months to bring about true postal reform and to include increases in salary as a part of that package. I support the proposal for an 11.1 percent increase in salary and a compression of the in grade increases so that a Clerk or Carrier need not wait for some 20 years to reach the top salary, but rather can reach the top salary level in approximately 8 years.

Mr. Freeburg hits the nail on the head and tells it like it is, as I mentioned above, and I think each and everyone of you should read this article because it is truthful and according to the facts. The article follows:

"POSTAL REFORM BILL STIFLED BY HOUSE AND SENATE LEADERS

"(By Russell Freeburg, Chicago Tribune Press Service)

"WASHINGTON, March 20.—Calls for postal reform have been loud and they have been clear for three years, but a handful of members of Congress unwilling to give up their power over the Post Office wouldn't listen.

"There is a strong feeling in the Capital tonight that if these men, mainly Rep. Thaddeus Dulski (D, N.Y.) and Sen. Gale McGee (D, Wyo.), had acted the nation wouldn't be threatened with a strike of postal workers.

"WON'T RELINQUISH POWER

"But men such as Dulski and McGee don't want to give up their political power over the Post Office. McGee is chairman of the Senate Post Office Committee. Dulski heads the Post Office Committee in the House.

"The Postmaster General has little real authority over major postal functions. It is Congress and the Committee chairmen who control the operating and capital budgets of the Post Office, dispense pay increases, and set postal rates.

"Nearly three years ago, in April, 1967, Lawrence O'Brien, then Postmaster General, first proposed abolishment of his job and conversion of the Post Office Department into a non-profit government corporation. He told Congress that the Post Office was 'in a race with catastrophe'.

"Seven months earlier, ten million pieces of mail had piled up in Chicago. For a decade, warnings of poor working conditions and mounting mail volume went unheeded on Capitol Hill, especially by Dulski and a few other members of his Post Office Committee. As recently as seven days ago Dulski voted against postal reform.

" 'The Post Office Department should fully reflect the genius of American management and industrial skills', said O'Brien in 1967. 'Management and employees alike should be paid according to standards of comparable industries. If we ran our telephone system the way we run our Post Office, the carrier pigeon business would still have a great future.'

"NIXON SEEKS REFORM

"The corporation idea with Dulski in immediate opposition was approved in July, 1968, by a Commission on Postal Organization set up by former President Johnson and headed by Frederick R. Kappel, retired chairman of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company.

"In May, 1969, President Nixon asked Congress for legislation, promptly bottled up by Dulski, to convert the Post Office Department into a government-owned, but self-supporting, corporation with only limited Congressional control.

"Nixon, as the Johnson Administration before him, said the Post Office Department should be taken out of politics. He said, 'Only a complete reorganization of the postal system can avert the steady deterioration of this vital public service.'

"The aim of his plan, Nixon said, is to 'dramatically improve working conditions, increase efficiency, and reduce costs.' One of the features of the postal corporation would be collective bargaining for postal employees, instead of Congress setting their wages.

"PAY RISES SLOWLY

"Since 1955, Congress has increased the pay of Letter Carriers from $3,640 annually to a range of $6,100 to $8,442. In the same years, Congress has increased its own pay from $15,000 to $42,500. There also have been scandals.

"Daniel Brewster, a member of the Senate Post Office Committee while a Democratic Senator from Maryland, and officials of Spiegel, Inc., Chicago mail order house, have been indicted on bribery charges stemming from Brewster's activities on the Committee. In August, 1967, Dulski acknowledged that he pocketed $11,000 raised from a testimonial dinner paid for mainly by mail lobbyists.

"McGee told a press conference this afternoon that he would fight to keep political control of the Post Office.

"There are signs that other members of Congress are getting restless about the stalling of fellow members like Dulski and McGee. Last Friday when Dulski voted against the Postal Reform Bill other members of the Post Office Committee finally overrode him and approved the Nixon administration plan."

Jim Rademacher, your National President, is a close personal friend of mine and we have worked closely to finalize the Postal Reform Bill, which includes salary increases as well as what postal unions have long sought, namely employee-management bargaining on wage and fringe benefits by law rather than by Executive Orders. Your National President told me a few days ago that he would do whatever is necessary to remind you of my dedication to your cause and that we have seen eye to eye throughout this very trying period so far as your future is concerned. But this same cooperation has not been forthcoming from the Clerks' Union. All of you should be mighty proud of Jim Rademacher. He is one of the truly sincere, honest, dedicated labor leaders in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I also find other responsible and knowledgeable reporters who "tell it like it is" and I refer to an article written by columnists Rowland Evans and Robert Novak which appeared in Wednesday morning's Washington Post. The article follows:

UNION INTRANSIGENCE ON REFORM LAID GROUNDWORK FOR MAIL CRISIS

(By Rowland Evans and Robert Novak)

Although Democratic politicians are having a field day blaming the postal crisis on President Nixon's intransigence, the groundwork for disaster was laid over the past three years by the stubborn opposition of postal union leaders to long-overdue reform.

Ever since President Johnson's postmaster general, Lawrence F. O'Brien, began pushing basic postal reform in 1967, the union bosses have stubbornly resisted not only reform but even gentle compromise out of fear it might undermine their power. Their adamant opposition was renewed when President Nixon's Postmaster General, Winton F. Blount, backed reform with an iron tenacity in refusing to surrender to implacable union opposition.

The fact, admitted privately by realistic congressional Democrats, is that there would be no postal crisis today—and postal employees would have a more nearly decent living wage—had the unions not refused to consider reform. What ever mistakes the Congress and Mr. Nixon have made the past six months could not have occurred but for that refusal.

The reason for this short-sighted opposition is found in the unique nature of the unions. Because Congress itself determines postal pay, postal unions do not engage in collective bargaining but in Capitol Hill lobbying. Their chiefs are not really labor leaders but high-priced Washington operatives, dispensing campaign contributions around Capitol Hill.

O'Brien's proposal for an independent postal corporation would have ended all this, establishing wage procedures ending in compulsory arbitration. Afraid of the unknown, the postal union leaders reflexively opposed reform—with the backing of AFL–CIO President George Meany.

As the Nixon administration took office in 1969, coincidental developments contributed to a turmoil in postal politics. The two major unions, the Letter Carriers and the Clerks, had new leadership and their once warm relationship grew frigid. There was feuding inside the Clerks, with the new president and legislative director in conflict. The Senate Post Office Committee had a brand new chairman, Sen. Gale McGee of Wyoming.

Most important was the nature of the new postmaster general. Unlike O'Brien, Blount was no politician willing to bend but a stiff-backed millionaire Alabama businessman appalled by inefficiency he found in the Post Office Department.

It was Blount's vigorous recommendation last autumn that led to President Nixon's warning that the 11 per cent postal pay raise passed by the House would be vetoed.

Blount's implicit offer: pass reform and you'll get your pay increase. Faced with this hard-boiled ultimatum, President William Rademacher of the Letter Carriers broke the solid union facade against reform.

A compromise pay-reform bill worked out by Rademacher, Blount, and Rep. Morris Udall of Arizona (foremost Democratic advocate of reform) finally cleared the House Post Office Committee on Feb. 12—to the amazed chagrin of its chairman, Rep. Thaddeus Dulski of New York, mouthpiece of the postal unions. Although the bill called for only a 5.4 per cent pay increase, it contained a provision—quietly agreed to by the White House—virtually guaranteeing a much bigger boost effective July 1.

But like so many union chieftains today, Rademacher had lost his rank-and-file. Just as they were about to get their delayed pay increase, the letter carriers revolted in wildcat strikes and the crisis was born.

It is a crisis for Rademacher as well as President Nixon and the U.S. Officials of other postal unions, having maintained their opposition to reform, bitterly resent Rademacher. They communicate with him only in formal communications (addressed "Dear Mr. Rademacher"). They can take pride in having maintained the proper degree of militancy.

Indeed, "with the pressure now on the President, Congress and Rademacher, the other union leaders are off the hook with their past record obscured. Lost in the shuffle, for example, is the fact that postal union leaders have long and unwisely opposed geographical distinctions in pay—a major grievance of hard-pressed New York City workers who began the walkout.

The result is impasse. With an atmosphere of lawlessness pervading the country, there is strong sentiment in both the White House and Congress against capitulation to the postal workers, inviting illegal strikes by municipal workers nationwide. All this could have been prevented had the unions accepted postal reform, but that simple truth is lost in the chaos.

Also, Mr. Speaker, I am including an article entitled "Nixon Acts To Move the Mail," which appeared as an editorial in the Washington Daily News on Tuesday, March 24:

NIXON ACTS TO MOVE THE MAIL

President Nixon had no other choice than to call out federal troops to move the mail in New York City. His promise to take similar action in Chicago, Detroit and other cities if the postal strike continues is a clear indication that Mr. Nixon intends to see that the mail is delivered—as a President must.

Any other course of action would be an invitation to anarchy.

Federal employes are forbidden by law to strike against the public. If the postal workers can strike—and win benefits that way—so can every one of the three million government employes in this country.

Neither the President nor the Congress is likely to approve pay raises until the strike ends—and the strikers are simply fooling themselves if they think otherwise.

As it stands, only about 20 per cent of the nation's 750,000 postal workers are taking part in the strike—the first since the postal system was organized by Ben Franklin in 1775.

Without question, many mailmen are underpaid, especially those working in cities where the cost of living is high.

As the President pointed out yesterday, the postal system "no longer serves its employes, its customers or its country as it should."

The Post Office Department should have been taken out of politics and operated like a business years ago. Unfortunately, it wasn't.

But this does not justify an illegal strike that cuts off Social Security checks, interferes with tax collections and disrupts countless other functions of commerce and government.

Mr. Nixon has asked the mailmen to come back to their jobs. If they hope to retain any semblance of public support, they should take his advice.

RIGHTS AND RESPONSIBILITIES

HON. JOHN M. ZWACH

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. ZWACH. Mr. Speaker, one of the newspapers I read regularly and with a great deal of interest is the weekly St. Cloud Visitor. I find some of its columns particularly thought provoking.

One such column, "Rights and Responsibilities" is very appropriate at this time.

With your permission, I would like to insert this column by Father James D. Hogan in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and commend its reading to my colleagues:

RIGHTS AND RESPONSIBILITIES

We are living in an age of rights. Voices from every side proclaim human rights, student rights, women's rights—and in many cases the arguments are right! Yet we see activists for various causes heedlessly trampling others' rights . . .

There is another side to the coin of justice. While obtaining and safeguarding rights are vitally important in a Christian society, there is more. Obligations only begin when we get and enjoy rights.

Responsibility is the duty of freedom. Slaves—and small children—have few responsibilities and few rights. With a very limited freedom, a person has few worries. If he fulfills simple tasks, he is taken care of. His obligations are almost nonexistent. The complexities of long-range planning and interaction with others are not the concerns of slaves or children.

But, once a man lifts up his head into the stimulating air of freedom, he is obliged to think of others. If he is free to act, he must act with regard for others—or he is unworthy of his rights. He is free of the heavy hand of serfdom or totalitarianism, but he assumes the obligation of responsibilities.

For an example, let's consider student rights and responsibilities.

A student has the right to receive an adequate education from the society in which he lives. If he is to benefit most from this training period, he must receive his greatest support from his family and from the taxes placed on productive citizens. But the student then has a responsibility to use, for society's benefit, the opportunity given him. School taxes are not designed to finance twelve-year vacations.

A student has the right to express his views. Still, he has the responsibility of allowing—and even encouraging—other opinions to be voiced. If he has the right to speak, he has the responsibility of helping others speak.

A student has the right to meaningful instruction. He should not be required to waste his time with useless trivia. In accord with this, he has the responsibility of using his own time well. If he demands the best, he has the corresponding duty of producing his best.

A student has the right to a widening social life. His contacts with others should be increasing both in number and variety. At the same time, his responsibilities are increasing. A boy's obligation to a girl he dates are greater than to a girl he merely passes in the hallway. Members of a team have a right to each other's support, but each member becomes responsible for all of his team.

Such a list can be endless. Wherever rights exist, there are corresponding responsibilities. Perhaps the truest test of a person's ability to enjoy rights is his reliability in meeting responsibilities.

Responsibilities stir up less passion and noise than rights. But I believe the steady, determined fulfillment of obligations—albeit at times with reminders—will advance Christian civilization further than preoccupation with one's own rights.

THE JOHN HANSON STATUE IN THE U.S. CAPITOL

HON. J. GLENN BEALL, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. BEALL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, in advance of the April birthdate of John Hanson, I would like to share with my colleagues the story entitled "The John Hanson Statue in the U.S. Capitol" which was written by Judge Edward S. Delaplaine of Frederick, Md.

John Hanson is one of Maryland's most distinguished patriots and statesman. He was a Delegate to the Continental Congress from 1780–83, and during that period served as President of the United States in Congress assembled. Along with Charles Carroll of Carrollton, he was designated by the Maryland Legislature to be honored by having a statue placed in the Capitol of the United States.

Judge Edward S. Delaplaine is also a very distinguished Marylander who served for a number of years on the Maryland Court of Appeals, which is our State's highest tribunal. Since retirement he has done yeoman service in collecting information and writing about matters of historical significance in our State and particularly in Frederick County. His story of "The John Hanson Statue in the U.S. Capitol" follows:

THE JOHN HANSON STATUE

The life story of John Hanson, whose home in Frederick, Maryland, was located on West Patrick Street west of Court Street while he was serving as President of the United States in Congress Assembled begins at Mulberry Grove in the year 1715.

The story of the statue of John Hanson—a seven-foot bronze in the Capitol of the United States—does not begin until more than 80 years after his death, which occurred at Oxon Hill Manor in the year 1783.

This story begins on April 19, 1864. Antietam and Gettysburg, were horrible memories. The battle of the Monocacy had not yet been fought.

The scene opens in the spacious new hall of the House of Representatives. Speaking on the floor of the House is a Congressman from Vermont, Justin S. Morrill, who is discussing a resolution he had introduced to make use of the old House chamber as a Statuary Hall. Mr. Morrill, in early life a merchant and farmer, eventually served 12 years in the House and nearly 32 years in the Senate.

The Capitol, as Mr. Morrill explained, had been built in five separate sections. "The expansion of our country from the old 13 to 36 states," he said, "imposed upon us the burden as well as the privilege of building and extending a structure for the accommodation of the legislative branches of the Government and appropriate for the Capitol of the foremost Republic in the world."

The first section to be erected was the original North wing. The cornerstone was laid in 1793 by the President, George Washington, assisted by Thomas Johnson of Frederick, who had been the first Governor of the State of Maryland, now head of the Board of Commissioners of the Federal City.

When the original North wing was completed in 1800, the members of Congress moved from Philadelphia to Washington, as the Federal City became officially known in 1791.

The original south wing was completed in 1807, and this was then occupied by the representatives.

In 1814 the British invaders set fire to the Capitol and also the White House. As soon as the South wing was reconstructed, the representatives moved back into it.

The Rotunda of the Capitol was built in 1827. Some years later the Congress decided to build another South wing for the House of Representatives and another north wing for the Senate. The new wing for the House was completed in 1857, the new wing for the Senate in 1859.

The Senate chamber in the old North wing was thereafter used for sessions of the United States Supreme Court.

For seven years after the Representatives moved into the new south wing, the old House chamber, which had been in use during a period of nearly fifty years, was put to no use whatever. So it happened that Mr. Morrill of Vermont was recommending to Congress that the old House chamber be used as a hall for statues of distinguished patriots.

Mr. Morrill's resolution provided as follows:

"Suitable structures and railing shall be erected in the old Hall of Representatives for the reception and protection of statuary * * * and the President is hereby authorized to invite each and all of the States to provide and furnish statues, in marble or bronze, not exceeding two in number of each State, of deceased persons who have been citizens thereof and illustrious for their historic renown or for distinguished civic or military services, such as each state may deem to be worthy of this national commemoration; and when so furnished the same shall be placed in the hall of the House of Representatives, in the Capitol of the United States, which is set apart, or so much thereof as may be necessary, as National Statuary Hall for the purpose herein indicated."

In support of the resolution Mr. Morrill said: "The extension of the Capitol has added so much space to existing accommodations that the old Hall is not required as a warehouse or for committee rooms, and it is impossible to divide and distribute it, if it were so required, in any manner that will be satisfactory, or that will not disclose an awkward, ill-begotten, ill-born, second-handed purpose; while if it shall be left whole and unmutilated as it now is, and only decorated, as now proposed, with works of art, it will appear as imposing and perfect as though the idea sprung from the brain of the architect at the foundation of the Capitol."

In conclusion he predicted that the gifts from the States would speedily furnish, without any cost to the National Government, a collection of statutary that would reflect honor upon the illustrious patriots and upon the Republic.

The resolution was passed by the House and the Senate and was thereupon presented to President Lincoln in the White House.

Lincoln gave his approval to the resolution on July 2, 1864—exactly one week before what was doubtless to be the most exciting day in the history of Frederick, the day when the municipal officials with the cooperation of the banks paid $200,000 as a ransom to prevent the burning of the city, and when the troops led by Jubal A. Early were delayed in their march toward Washington by the troops commanded by Lew Wallace along the Monocacy River three miles from Frederick.

It cannot be said that the states furnished the statues speedily. Rhode Island, it is true, was prompt, presenting a statue of General Nathaniel Greene in 1870 and one of Roger Williams in 1872. But action by other states was not so prompt. It was not until 1903—thirty-eight years after the death of President Lincoln—that the two Maryland statues were installed in Statuary Hall.

In 1896—thirty-two years after Congress set apart the old hall of the House of Representatives for use as Statuary Hall—the Legislature of Maryland took the first step toward placing two statues in the National Capitol. In that year a resolution was introduced to request the Governor to appoint a commission of five citizens to report to the Legislature which two Marylanders were, in the judgment of the commissioners, most worthy of national commemoration in Statuary Hall.

A unique feature of the resolution was that, although Maryland had been known for her many patriots, who had achieved distinction sufficient to make them worthy of being entered in the Hall of Fame—such statesmen as Thomas Johnson, John Hanson, Samuel Chase, and Charles Carroll of Carrollton; a Chief Justice of the United States, Roger B. Taney; Luther Martin and William Pinkney, famous lawyers; and notable military officers including John Eager Howard, William Smallwood, Otho Holland Williams, and Tench Tilghman—there was a mention of only one distinguished Marylander in the resolution. In it was a provision that it should be the particular duty of the commission to "report whether or not in the judgment of such commissioners one of such statues should be of Francis Scott Key, the author of our immortal national ode, 'The Star-Spangled Banner.'"

Presumably this suggestion for the members of the commission was a hint that recommendation of Francis Scott Key for one of the statues would be agreeable to the Governor and the members of the Legislature.

There could be no doubt that the choice of Key for one of the statues would be pleasing to the Governor, Lloyd Lowndes, who was a resident of Cumberland, for Lowndes was a descendant of Governor Edward Lloyd 5th, whose sister, Mary Tayloe Lloyd, became Key's wife in 1802.

The resolution was undoubtedly pleasing also to the Senator from Frederick County, Frank C. Norwood, a forty-year-old member of the Frederick bar. Mr. Norwood, who was unusually fond of Maryland history, was personally acquainted with members of the Francis Scott Key Monument Association, who were raising funds for a monument over Key's grave in Mount Olivet Cemetery in Frederick. To many of his friends Senator Norwood had told how proud he had been while on a trip to the Pacific Coast to see the Francis Scott Key Monument in Golden Gate Park, which had been unveiled before the erection of the monument in Frederick.

After the resolution was passed by the Senate and House of Delegates, Governor Lowndes named the members of the commission. Their report was presented to the Legislature at its session of 1898, but Key's name was not mentioned. The report recommended:

(1) That Charles Carroll of Carrollton be commemorated by one of the statutes.

(2) That for the other statue, General John Eager Howard be commemorated, if military services are preferred for recognition; but if civil services are preferred, then Thomas Johnson, the first Governor of the State, be commemorated.

The commission also reported that an appropriation of $12,000 for each statue would not in their judgment be excesssive but would probably approximate the cost of the sculpture.

The Legislature rejected the recommendations of John Eager Howard and Governor Thomas Johnson, and ordered that the statues should be made of Charles Carroll of Carrollton and John Hanson.

The Legislature appropriated the sum of $24,000 to pay for the two statues and directed the Governor to appoint a commission of five to carry their law into effect. The law was approved by the Governor April 14, 1898.

Governor Lowndes named on this commission former Governor John Lee Carroll, Douglass H. Thomas, General Thomas J. Shryock, Richard K. Cross, and Fabian Franklin, Ph.-D., editor of the Baltimore News.

Mr. Carroll, who had served as Governor from 1876 to 1880, was a great-grandson of Charles Carroll of Carrollton. He was born at Homewood, now a part of the campus of Johns Hopkins University, but when he was three years old, his father moved to ancestral Doughoregan Manor. The future Governor was educated at Mount St. Mary's College and at Georgetown. While he refused to seek any further political office after his term as Governor, he cheerfully agreed to serve as chairman of the commission to arrange for the sculpture of the statues of Carroll and Hanson.

The commission selected as their sculptor a young native of Massachusetts, Richard E. Brooks, whose father was born in England and mother in Scotland. The sculptor had grown up in the vicinity of the granite quarries of Quincy. He was only in his thirties, but he had studied sculpture in Boston and his first important work, a bust of Governor Russell, was so satisfactory that he was encouraged to go to Paris to devote himself to further study. There his first Salon subject brought him honorable mention in 1895. His next important work was the statue of Thomas Cass, which was installed in the public gardens in Boston. This statue was acclaimed to be "as fine a statue of a quiet, soldierly figure as any which an American sculptor has yet produced."

Sculptor Brooks worked with great diligence on the statues of Carroll and Hanson. He was impressed by the fact that he was carving statues that would be installed in the Nation's Hall of Fame in the Capitol, where they would be seen by countless millions of Americans as well as hosts of sightseers from all over the world.

And so he worked with meticulous care and with all the skill at his command. Fortunately there were several portraits of the patriots. One early portrait of Hanson had been painted by John Hesselius, but the sculptor evidently relied more largely on the later painting which Charles Willson Peale had made for Independence Hall.

Governor Lowndes was no longer in office when the statues were completed. He had campaigned for re-election in 1899 but was defeated by John Walter Smith of Worcester County. Smith was inaugurated in 1900 and it was he who was notified in 1902 that the statues were cast in bronze.

Shortly before Congress adjourned for Christmas in 1902, Governor Smith signed two letters, one to the United States Senate, the other to the House of Represenatives, giving official notice that Maryland was ready to present the statues of Carroll and Hanson to the National Government.

At that time the Senators from Maryland were George L. Wellington of Allegany County and Louis E. McComas of Washington County.

McComas, the junior Senator, a graduate of Dickinson College and a member of the Washington County bar, handled the arrangements for the ceremony in the Senate. It was scheduled for Saturday afternoon, January 31, 1903.

McComas made the first address in the Senate. Before commencing he presented a concurrent resolution that the thanks of Congress be presented to the State of Maryland for providing the bronze statues of Carroll and Hanson, and that they be accepted and placed in National Statuary Hall.

The crowning service of Hanson's career, Senator McComas said, was his unalterable determination to oppose ratification of the Articles of Confederation until all the States had surrendered their claims to the Northwest Territory. He asserted that Maryland, in leading the way for the acquisition of the National domain, laid the foundation for the Federal Union.

For this one stand alone, the Senator said, Hanson was worthy to be placed in Statuary Hall. It determined for all time, he said, that "the after acquired territory of the United States should in due time by Congress be fashioned and admitted as States, augmenting the power of the Republic and the grandeur of the American Union."

Four Senators from the States—George F. Hoar of Massachusetts, Jonathan P. Dolliver of Iowa, Chauncey M. Depew of New York, and Augustus O. Bacon of Georgia—added praise for the patriotic services of Carroll and Hanson.

Senator Wellington delivered the final speech. Although he had started to work at the age of twelve, and thus was mainly self-educated, Wellington had become successful in Cumberland as a banker and industrialist and he was a forceful orator.

In his tribute to John Hanson, Wellington said:

"He was the first President of the United States in Congress Assembled, and his hand guided the fortunes of the new Nation in the year which brought the final success of American arms, after a long period of vicissitudes and changeful fortune.

"He was not a man of selfish ambition but became active in the affairs of his native Colony by reason of his love of country and steadfast purpose to stand by and for the right. Only a high sense of duty kept him for five and twenty years constantly engaged in public service, and allowed him to retire only when his fondest hopes had been realized in the consummation of freedom and self-government for native land."

Upon a motion made by Wellington, the Senate adopted the resolution offered by McComas.

The arrangements for the ceremony in the House of Representatives were made by Congressman George A. Pearre, a graduate of Princeton, West Virginia University, and the Law School of the University of Maryland, and a member of the Cumberland bar.

Mr. Pearre spoke at length on Charles Carroll of Carrollton, and was followed by Congressman John Dalzell of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Pearre had invited his colleague, Charles R. Schirm, of Baltimore, to pay the tribute to Hanson.

Mr. Schirm said that after the French and Indian War the tide of immigration turned to the fertile regions of Frederick County, and thither in 1773 John Hanson followed the long train of sturdy home builders. His sound judgment and honesty of character, he said, won for him the respect and confidence of the people.

After mentioning that Hanson held the highest Federal office ever conferred upon a Marylander, Mr. Schirm paid tribute to other members of the Hanson family, who had rendered public service:

"His grandfather, Colonel Hanson, fell at Lutzen for the cause of religious liberty; his oldest brother, Judge Walter Hanson, was Commissary for Charles County; his brother Samuel was a patriot and presented to General Washington 600 pounds sterling to provide shoes for his barefoot soldiers; William, his youngest brother, was Examiner General of Maryland; his son, Alexander Contee, was a patriot and intimate with Washington, was one of the first Judges of the General Court and Chancellor of the State; and an Elector for Washington, and compiled the Laws of Maryland; his son, Samuel, was a surgeon in the Life Guards of Washington; and his son, Peter Contee, of the Maryland Line, was wounded at Fort Washington."

Upon motion of Mr. Schirm, the House adopted the concurrent resolution introduced by Mr. Pearre thanking the State, accepting their statues, and ordering that they be placed in Statuary Hall.

The statue of Carroll is in Statuary Hall, but after thirty years Hanson's statue was moved to another location in the Capitol. The reason for the change of location was that as States were added to the Union and new statues were presented by the States, some of the members of Congress were apprehensive that the concentrated weight of marble and bronze might possibly cause a structural collapse. Following an investigation by an engineer, the Congress passed a resolution in 1933 directing that the statues be relocated in order to relieve the congestion in Statuary Hall. The work of relocation commenced in 1934.

Today three of the statues that belong to the Statuary Hall Collection are in the Rotunda. The others in the Rotunda were not gifts from any State, but were acquired otherwise.

The statues comprising the Statuary Hall Collection are now installed in the following seven locations in the Capitol:

(1) Statuary Hall, the original chamber of the House of Representatives.

(2) The Rotunda.

(3) The small House Rotunda.

(4) The House Connecting Corridor.

(5) The Senate Connecting Corridor.

(6) The Vestibule of the old Supreme Court Chamber.

(7) The Hall of Columns on the first floor of the House wing.

The statue of John Hanson was moved out of Statuary Hall and given a location in the Senate Connecting Corridor. However, it will always be considered as a part of the Statuary Hall Collection. Moreover, the location of the statues is not of paramount importance. Their significance lies in the lessons taught by the careers and characters of those who are commemorated in the Hall of Fame.

Senator Wellington spoke with eloquence of their influence in his peroration in the United States Senate on the last day of January in 1903. Just before moving the acceptance of the statues of Carroll and Hanson, the senior Maryland Senator paid this tribute to their immortality:

They have passed away, but they shall be ever remembered, and their fame will extend into the distant future. Their influence has not ceased. True it is, the principles which they evolved and for which they struggled seem at present to be obscured by an eclipse. If it be so, would it not be well upon this occasion to call a halt in the fateful march, would it not be well to look backward, and, if necessary, retrace our steps until we may stand again in that altitude where our vision will become bright and clear * * * and in its stead we shall see again that light which led us for a century and a quarter in honorable history and glorious achievement as a nation?

"We shall march to the music of the song of the great Declaration for which Charles Carroll and John Hanson lived and labored throughout many years, and realize, as did they, that our strength as a Nation depends upon the exemplification of the grandest doctrine ever promulgated to men—that they shall be free and govern themselves, under God, according to their own consent and pleasure."

ALCOHOL-GASOLINE FUEL WOULD CUT POLLUTION, FARM SURPLUSES

HON. THOMAS S. KLEPPE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. KLEPPE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I had the privilege of testifying at a joint meeting of the Subcommittee on Air and Pollution of the Senate Public Works Committee and the Subcommittee on Energy, Natural Resources, and the Environment of the Senate Commerce Committee on the feasibility of blending gasoline with alcohol made from grain to provide a cleaner burning motor vehicle fuel.

I include in the RECORD my testimony, together with the text of a statement on the same matter submitted by Mr. Dwight L. Miller, Assistant Director of the Northern Research Service, U.S. Department of Agriculture, Peoria, Ill.:

TESTIMONY BY REPRESENTATIVE THOMAS S. KLEPPE

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee. I appreciate this opportunity to testify on air pollution control legislation.

My testimony today relates exclusively to the advantages of combining gasoline with alcohol made from grain to produce a cleaner burning motor vehicle fuel. I believe a strong start in this direction could be made within the framework of amendments to the Clean Air Act proposed by many Members of Congress, including myself.

On February 16, 1970, I wrote to President Nixon, suggesting that he instruct affected Federal agencies to investigate the possibilities of utilizing the alcohol-gasoline blend as a means of combatting air pollution.

There is nothing new about the basic idea. For many years it has been extensively discussed, studied and tested. Today, with the great national interest in our total environment and with the serious air pollution caused by motor vehicle exhausts, it may be an idea whose time has finally come.

There isn't any question that an alcohol-gasoline blend will work efficiently in present-day motor vehicles. It will measurably reduce hydrocarbon exhaust emissions, by as much as 50 per cent, some tests show. It will prolong engine life. It will provide extra power, without a tetraethyl-lead additive. It has long been used successfully in other countries.

The obvious question is: Why aren't we using it? The answer, up to now, has always been: Cost.

Back in the middle-1950's, President Eisenhower appointed a commission to study increased industrial uses of agricultural products. Then the principal objective was to expand markets for surplus farm products. The projected cost of producing alcohol from grain led the commission to conclude that it would be "impracticable to recommend an alcohol motor-fuel program."

The urgent need to control air pollution—to regulate automobile emissions of carbon monoxide and hydrocarbons—places the cost factor of converting grain to alcohol in a different perspective now. Moreover, large-scale conversion of grain to alcohol could literally save billions of dollars of farm program costs.

In his Message to Congress on the Environment, the President pointed out that "Most air pollution is produced by the burning of fuels. About half is produced by motor vehicles."

The proposed amendments to the Clean

Air Act would empower the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare to "establish standards respecting the chemical or physical properties of any (motor vehicle) fuel or fuel additive to assure that such fuel or fuel additive will not cause or contribute to emissions which would endanger the public health or welfare. . . ."

Even though new engine designs, more lead-free gasolines and improved exhaust control devices will come during the 1970's, millions of motor vehicles now on the road and to be built in the next few years will be operating well into the 1980's. It would appear on the basis of what we already know, that immediate implementation of an alcohol-gasoline program is fully warranted. We could begin on a limited basis almost overnight. The mood and the money were not there in the past but they are today.

I believe what is needed now, to get a large-scale alcohol-gasoline fuel "on the road," is convincing proof that it can be done economically. We must look not only at the first cost of extracting alcohol from grain but also at the value of the high protein by-product which remains as a food and feed source. We must consider what a cleaner-burning lead-free motor vehicle fuel would be worth from both a public health and dollar standpoint.

We must consider the savings in farm program and price support costs which would result from the elimination of production controls and payments to farmers for diverting wheat and feed grain acreage. This would be in the neighborhood of $2 billion a year and there would be further savings of perhaps half a billion dollars in storage, interest and administrative costs borne by USDA.

In other words, we must look at the many "offsets" against the cost of producing alcohol from grain. Viewed that way, I am reasonably convinced that alcohol can be made from grain at relatively low cost—low enough to make it economical and practical as an automotive fuel.

Although the petroleum industry opposed this concept in the past, for obvious reasons, we have a far different situation today. Like it or not, the industry will have to come up with a much cleaner-burning and probably lead-free fuel or alternative power sources will inevitably be developed. The State of California is now buying automobiles powered with bottled gas. Battery-powered automobiles (we had some years ago) are being considered again. Some say we should go back to the Stanley Steamer. And it has even been suggester, facetiously I am sure, that a 100-mile-long extension cord could be hooked up to the dream car of the future.

Alcohol is also made from petroleum products. This certainly gives the petroleum industry a major stake in the development of alcohol-gasoline fuels. Moreover, the petroleum reserves of the United States are neither unlimited nor renewable. Alcohol from grain is, of course, a renewable resource.

Although industry now has the capacity for producing considerable amounts of alcohol, a mammoth expansion would be required to convert three or four billion bushels of grain into this form each year. Several hundred plants, costing several billions of dollars, would have to be constructed. If the petroleum industry shifts from tetraethyl-leaded gasolines to the more costly refining processes necessary to produce higher-octane, non-leaded products, the transition would be at least as expensive.

The President of Union Oil Company says on this:

"Several years will be required to construct the needed new refining equipment. The total capital cost of installing new refining equipment nationwide to add 7 octane numbers is estimated to be between $5 billion and $6 billion. Because of limited construction capacity, it is impossible for all major refineries to add such needed equipment in a time schedule that may be required by law"

So, I ask, why not go the other route? Why not start now with production of the alcohol-gasoline blend?

The implications of this for the Nation's farm economy would be enormous. For years we have sought to obtain new industries for rural areas. Certainly it would make sense to locate alcohol extraction plants where the grain is produced.

If we "freed up" our millions of retired acres for all-out grain production, both the farm economy and the total economy would get a much-needed boost. It would take more machinery, more gasoline (blended with alcohol). More fertilizer, more labor, more transportation, more of everything that goes into farm production and the transportation and utilization of agricultural commodities.

It would open the way for tremendous increases in the development of higher-yielding wheats and other grains which might not meet present-day milling standards but which would be entirely suitable for conversion into alcohol. Today there is advanced experimentation on a durum wheat-rye cross—Triticale—which has tremendous yield potential, as much as 200 bushels per acre on a dryland farm, according to some reports.

There is no doubt in my mind that by putting our idle acres to work and, at the same time, utilizing more fully the higher-yielding grain varieties, the United States could easily produce the extra three billion or more bushels needed to meet motor vehicle fuel requirements. There would still be enough—a safe margin—to meet both domestic and export requirements.

As of January 31, 1970, Commodity Credit Corporation had under price support loan and under actual ownership, 1,762,399,000 bushels of feed grains and 862 million bushels of wheat. Both of these totals are up substantially over a year earlier.

These quantities of grain are not all to be counted as surpluses. Conservatively, though, I would say about half of the totals could be so classified. In other words, we have more than enough grain available now to swamp existing facilities for converting grain to alcohol. By the time additional facilities were available, farm production could easily be increased sufficiently to keep them operating at full capacity.

I have received a few letters from people who say it is criminal to talk about converting grain to motor vehicle fuel at a time when there are millions of hungry people in the United States and hundreds of millions throughout the world. If this be true, then it is also immoral to impose production restrictions on American farmers today. What I am proposing, essentially, is a program under which we would continue to supply at least as much food grain to our own people and to those around the world as we are today. The grain for alcohol would come from increased American production—from our idle acres and the higher-yielding crop varieties.

Then there is the question of cost—both to the government and to the user of the alcohol-gasoline blend. When he "offsets" I mentioned are cranked into the equation, it seems to me that the government would gain, both in farm program savings and in the incalculable benefits which would result from cleaner air.

From the motorist's point of view, I believe a blend of 10 or 12 per cent of grain alcohol with gasoline will cost him little more than the higher octaine, non-leaded gasoline he will be using in the future if the decision is made to rely entirely on what the Union Oil Company calls "more severe refining processes." If the "offsets" are fully weighed, it may well be less.

In fact, the motorist using the alcohol-gasoline blend would receive as a bonus, instead of green stamps or a free candy bar, actual dollar savings through the longer and more trouble-free operation of his automobile engine.

It seems to me that the transition to the alcohol-gasoline blend could be made in an orderly way, without disrupting the petroleum industry, the automotive industry or the farm economy. We could start now, in a limited way, with what we have available. There is time to smooth out the bumps in the road ahead before we get there. It will take some planning, some ingenuity and some determination. But it can be done.

I am encouraged by the support I have received not only from the public but also from Members of Congress, scientists and others concerned with the air pollution problem. It is time to bring this dream, so long held by American farmers, to reality.

STATEMENT BY DWIGHT L. MILLER

Mr. Chairman, I am Dwight L. Miller, Assistant Director, Northern Regional Research Laboratory of the Agricultural Research Service, U.S. Department of Agriculture, in Peoria, Illinois. I am a Chemical Engineering graduate of the University of Illinois, and had over 20 years experience in the fermentation and chemical industries before joining the Department of Agriculture 12 years ago. Our division conducts utilization research on corn, wheat, grain, sorghum and other grains.

In the past two or three years we have had increasing interest and inquiries concerning up-to-date information on the production of ethyl alcohol from cereal grains and its use in motor fuels. About a year ago I was requested to bring together the studies and developments and prepare a report on "Industrial Alcohol from Wheat," for presentation at the Sixth National Wheat Utilization Research Conference, Oakland, California, Nov. 5–7, 1969.

Since I presented the report in November there has recently been fuller recognition of motor fuel as an air pollutant, and the overabundant supply of cereal grains has resulted in greatly renewed interest in the whole subject of alcohol's use in motor fuels.

I will present the highlights of my research report and then be glad to answer any questions relating to the technical processes of producing alcohol from grain and some of the aspects of utilization of that alcohol in a motor fuel mixture.

Ethyl alcohol in the United States is produced both by fermentation and by chemical synthesis. Cereal grains, sugar, molasses, and other natural products, are the major raw materials for the fermentation. Beverage alcohol must by law come from these raw materials. Synthetic alcohol is produced from petroleum-based oils or gasses. Industrial fermentation alcohol and synthetic alcohol are chemically identical. The present annual United States industrial (nonbeverage) alcohol market is about 300 million gallons and the alcohol is almost entirely synthetic because it is lower in cost.

Practically all natural products high in starch or sugar could be used to produce industrial ethyl alcohol by fermentation. Corn and sugar byproducts (molasses) have been selected in the past because of low cost. Wheat, sorghum, and other materials, have had relatively minor use. However, during World War II (1942–1945), when alcohol need was critical for synthetic rubber production and cost was of lesser importance, about 250 million bushels of wheat were used for alcohol production. The alcohol yield from all these materials is theoretically in direct ratio to the contained starch or sugar per unit weight. In practice, the chemical and physical properties of each natural raw material affect the production to some degree. The most important byproduct of the grain fermentation operation is residual, distillers grains, containing all of the original ingredients, except the starch or sugar. This byproduct has a protein content of 20 to 30 percent depending on the type of grain and its original protein content. This high protein byproduct has been used as animal feed.

Synthetic alcohol has developed since 1929 and now supplies the industrial alcohol market. Most of this alcohol is produced from ethylene obtained from petroleum and natural gas. Newer synthetic alcohol plants are relatively large with minimum annual capacities in the order of 50 million gallons.

Ethyl alcohol has had use in some countries as a component of motor fuels. In the United States petroleum products have generally been the least expensive fuel and therefore furnish the best motor fuel. It is possible to use gasoline-alcohol blends in present engines with acceptable performance. A blend should contain at least 10 per cent (by volume) alcohol to prevent handling and separation problems and must be anhydrous alcohol. Lower proportions of alcohol might be used, but would necessitate dual or more expensive carburetor systems.

The basic problem hindering this utilization has been unfavorable economics. Legislative action that would require the use of alcohol blends with alcohol produced from cereal grain (i.e., wheat) would be required for a significant volume motor fuel alcohol market. Through such legislative action, all motor fuel could be required to contain at least 10 per cent ethyl alcohol, produced from United States cereal grain (types and ratio could be specified) in U.S. plants. The market for grain created by such legislation would be very large. The annual U.S. consumption of automobile fuels is about 85 billion gallons. Over 3 billion bushels of cereal grains would be required annually to produce the 8.5 billion gallons of anhydrous alcohol for a 10-percent blend.

Capital investment for the approximately 500 fermentation plants necessary to produce this amount of alcohol would be in the order of $6 billion. Practically all the fermentation plants would be new.

About 25 million tons of high protein byproduct distillers grains would also be obtained. The effects of this quantity of byproducts on the animal feed market have not been evaluated. The feeding value of these distillers grains varies, according to F. B. Morrison's book, "Feeds and Feeding". According to Morrison, insufficient data are available on distillers grains from wheat for comparison, although Morrison implies that the wheat product should be comparable to that from corn.

The effect of alcohol blends on motor fuel costs depends on many factors, including grain prices, conversion costs, byproduct feed values, profits, and other expenses. Assuming such a program were legislated, the alcohol blend would add about one cent per gallon plus the grain cost. Grain at $1.00 per bushel would add 4 cents per gallon, making a total increase cost of five cents per gallon. The effect of grain prices on the alcohol cost is shown in the attached table. In all cases, the costs do not include any allowance for profits, packaging, and sales expense.

Tetraethyl lead (TEL) is now used in more than 97 percent of all motor fuels. Its proposed removal for pollution control will require major revisions in petroleum refining procedures, automotive engine design, and fuel blending. The economics of producing the engines and lead-free fuels is now a major and unresolved subject. Increased fuel costs by refining, as reported in several journals, have been in the 2.5 to 4.0 cents per gallon range and the required capital expenditures have been estimated at $4.2 to $6.0 billion. The use of an alcohol-gasoline mixture in automobiles would be a lead-free fuel that would eliminate lead pollution from auto emissions.

Ethyl alcohol could have an important role also in controlling hydrocarbon pollution from automobile emissions but apparently would not completely eliminate pollution from this source. The Southwest Research Institute reported (Air Pollution Control Association Meeting, Houston, Texas, June 1964) that 25 percent alcohol-gasoline blends resulted in average reductions in exhaust hydrocarbons of 25 to 30 percent; and a few individual tests showed greater reductions. More complete information on modern engines is needed for definite conclusions.

For maximum reduction of pollution from exhaust emission, catalytic converters to remove the products of incomplete combustion appear to be a favored approach. Tests with catalytic converters have indicated the lead in present gasoline that passes through the exhaust poisons the catalyst and destroys its ability to control hydrocarbon pollution. It is most probable that the combustion products of gasoline containing 10% alcohol would not poison the catalytic converter. These converters are being perfected by automobile manufacturers and scheduled to be installed on all cars in the future. Converters would presumably last much longer with the alcohol mixture than with the present lead additive. This prospect could be substantiated through research in a relatively short period of time and should be initiated immediately if plans are made for the use of alcohol-gasoline blends in motor fuels.

BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. EDWARD J. PATTEN

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. PATTEN. Mr. Speaker, today in the State of Byelorussia officials will celebrate the observance of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Lenin, former head of the Soviet Government.

I would like to convey to my colleagues, however, what Lenin and his policies have meant to the Byelorussian people as expressed to me by Mr. John Kosiak, president of the Byelorussian Congress Committee of America. He states:

By introduction of his own totalitarian communist regime in Byelorussia, Lenin deprived Byelorussian people of all its human rights and freedoms, the rights recognized by the Western World at this time, and proclaimed earlier by the Byelorussian Democratic Republic. Those rights being: freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, freedom of press, freedom of association, freedom of worship, freedom of economical activity, freedom to elect one's own government, freedom to choose one's habitat and travel abroad, immunity of home, independence of judiciary, etc. . . Freedom of activity was given to the Bolshevik Party only, which was executing orders from the central government in Moscow. The leadership of this party in Byelorussia was composed of non-Byelorussians. It was a reliable instrument for domination over the Byelorussian nation.

The last 50 years in Byelorussian history have indeed been tragic. This country has seen the annihilation of over 6 million of her inhabitants, the systematic Russianization, deportation, and colonization of her people.

Mr. Speaker, the designation of today, March 25, 1970, as the day to honor Lenin in Byelorussia, is certainly a crowning insult. For today among the Byelorussian people is commemorated as the 52d anniversary of independence. It honors that day in 1918 when these wonderful people at last tasted the freedom we take for granted. It was so short lived, and yet there continues to be hope among the Byelorussians that they may one day again join the family of free Nations. I would like to join my colleagues and Byelorussians everywhere in marking this 52d anniversary of independence. May my Byelorussian friends know I support them in their strugle. Let us hope and pray that they will once again set their country free.

NIXON ADMINISTRATION'S GOALS FOR THE COUNTRY

HON. WILLIAM H. AYRES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I am today placing in the RECORD what I consider to be the best statement of the Nixon administration's goals for the country which I have yet seen.

This statement is an address delivered by the Secretary of Labor, the Honorable George P. Shultz, before the management conference of the Graduate School of Business of the University of Chicago.

The Secretary, who used to be the dean of the Graduate School of Business at Chicago, was on familiar turf. It was not necessarily pro-Nixon turf. It was an ideal time and place for a high official of the administration to set forth the goals and fundamental operations of the Nixon administration. This the Secretary did with his customary style, logic, and clarity.

By having the central, National Government set standards and the State and local governments carry out operations, it is the purpose of the "new federalism" of the Nixon administration to achieve, in Secretary Shultz' words: "New standards of fairness, new respect for diversity, and a new spirit of confidence in our system of government."

Mr. Speaker, I commend this eloquent address by Secretary Shultz to every Member:

ADDRESS BY SECRETARY OF LABOR GEORGE P. SHULTZ

I don't think the Nixon Administration is being well enough criticized.

I did not say we weren't being criticized enough. I said not well enough. Here is what I mean:

In domestic as well as in foreign affairs, the President is pursuing a strategy. You may not agree with his strategy; but I think you owe it to yourselves to come to grips with that strategy, to try to understand this Administration's philosophy, so you can criticize it fairly and constructively.

One of the cliches of this Administration is a phrase taken from professional football—"game plan." Whenever I make a proposal, or whenever we come up with a new tactic, we have to show how it fits in the overall game plan.

Today, I would like to go beyond the confines of being a spokesman in the field of labor, to try to explain what our Administration game plan is. There are some who will call it madness, but even they will have to admit there is some method in it.

Let me begin by suggesting what our method is not. We are not professional zigzaggers. We are not trying to sell liberal principles with conservative rhetoric, or vice versa. We are not trying to heal the nation's differences by "splitting the difference."

Our preference for a theoretical underpinning shows in many ways. At a Washington Redskins football game last season, there was a blatantly bad call by the referee on pass interference. Edward Bennett Williams, owner of the team, yelled "Bad call!" Former Chief Justice Warren, sitting next to him, said in a dignified way "Poor judgment." And Henry Kissinger rose to his feet, shook his fist at the referee, and shouted "On what theory?"

We ask ourselves "on what theory?" all the time. The theory, or political philosophy, that has emerged after one year has been called the New Federalism. I submit to you that it is more than a catch phrase; it is a new approach, one that has evolved from the national experience, one deserving careful analysis by thoughtful men.

To grasp the new approach, you have to cast out one of the basic measurements of political ideology—the idea of liberal versus conservative, the old political spectrum of left and right. It will be a wrench to set aside this familiar caliper, but it does not measure what is going on in government today.

That is because, in the past decade, liberals and conservatives found themselves using the same language in describing their common complaints.

Liberals were complaining that government was becoming unresponsive—that there was a greater need for local and citizen involvement. This sounded like the old conservative demand for decentralization.

Conservatives, on the other hand, were saying that our welfare system and our educational establishment were in need of fundamental reform, to correct the unfairness built in over three decades of trying to cure social ills. Liberals found little to argue about in that.

It was as if the nation had gone through a gigantic half-time and the old opponents had switched sides, each now marching on the other's former goal.

But the change is deeper than that. The change centered on a unique area of agreement. As a Labor Secretary, it is my job to discover areas of agreement in what appear to be positions of great dispute, and I can certainly see one here.

Liberals and conservatives agree on the need for a new fairness in American life. And hopefully, through this new sense of fairness we can achieve greater efficiency in the administration of domestic affairs.

Liberals and conservatives agree on the need for a selective decentralization of government.

Liberals and conservatives agree on a reform of our institutions that makes the setting of national standards a national affair and makes the detailed administration of government programs a very local affair.

The New Federalism broadens and deepens these areas of agreement. In essence, the New Federalism calls upon us to act as one nation in setting the standards of fairness, and then to act as congeries of communities in carrying out those standards. We are nationalizing equity as we localize control, while retaining a continued federal stewardship to insure that national standards are attained.

The best way to explain any theory is to cite examples. And the examples are there, in the field of labor and in many others.

Take welfare. A national sense of fairness says that a man who is working ought to make more than a man who is not working. A national common sense says that a working man who makes less than a man on welfare across the street will be inclined to stop working.

To introduce that element of fairness in our family assistance proposal, we aim to assist the working poor in a way that will always make it profitable to work.

But to permit diversity, to encourage localities and States to make their own decisions on the degree to which they want to help the less fortunate, we provide an income floor but no ceiling. It is up to the States and cities to administer large portions of this program consistent with national goals and to decide for themselves how much more they are able to do.

Thus, we have a national minimum on family assistance—as the President puts it, "no child is worth more in one State than in another," as far as the Federal government is concerned. At the same time, we have local participation in administration and local say-so on what more should be done. National fairness, local diversity.

Take manpower training, really a classic example of this New Federalism. On the national level, we recognize the need for training people for new and better jobs, and the need to fund this activity. But most labor markets are local in scope—this is where the action is and this is where the best judgment concerning the use of resources should be. The basic way we have proposed to handle this situation is to provide incentives for State and local government and private sponsors to get into the act—providing more money and more local control in specific stages, as localities develop the means to put these programs into action. Again, national fairness, local assumption of control.

Another example in the labor area—safety standards. Two million workers a year are injured on the job. On the Federal level the President's proposal would set up a national Occupational Safety and Health Board; its standards are to adapted and administered by the States, as they demonstrate their capacity to take this over. The enforcement of safety standards is local, with national monitors. The Federal government pays 90% of the State's planning costs, then shares the administrative costs on a 50–50 basis. Again, national standards, local administration and enforcement, a reserve federal "clout."

Attaining our national goal of equal opportunity in employment is another example of the New Federalism. Where Federal funds are used, affirmative action can be used to eliminate discrimination in employment on the part of management or labor. In our Philadelphia Plan, we put this into practical action in the construction industry for the first time—and not without considerable controversy. But there is no necessity for the mechanical application of Federal standards if the local people can work out a strong agreement among themselves. In this case, as in so many others, there is no solution like a hometown solution—provided it works toward our national goal.

I could cite a dozen other examples of this New Federalist approach—in our environmental program, that sets anti-pollution standards and provides for local enforcement and a sharing of the financing of treatment facilities; in tax policy, that removes seven million poor from the tax rolls and provides a greater incentive to start working; in our computerized job bank, that looks toward a national information system with local and regional participation and control.

In case after case, the pattern is clear—a concern for fairness as a nation, a concern for diversity as a people, a recognition of federal stewardship.

But while it is a clear pattern, it is not a simple one. You cannot label this "decentralization"—because the establishment of so many national standards, in so many fields, is a form of centralization. But this is done in a way that does not dehumanize and depersonalize government, resulting in alienated people and ineffective bureaucracy. It is done in a way that decentralizes administration and encourages local participation, bringing about the best of both worlds—fairness and citizen involvement. At least, that is what we are hoping to do.

By taking this tack, we hope to reinstill in the American people their faith in the responsiveness of their government to what they consider to be fair.

By following this method we call the New Federalism, we hope to reinstill self-reliance on the part of individuals and strength in the institutions of local and State government and voluntary agencies.

And by pursuing these principles, we hope to achieve a society more pluralistic in its operation and more equal in its opportunity. We do not believe that equality of opportunity is the enemy of diversity.

If we are successful with our philosophy—in actually bringing about this realignment of power between the levels of government, what sort of nation will we become?

We will no longer be divided by the fear of centralized domination and the personal alienation such domination always brings.

At the same time we will not be a nation where tranquility and calm and harmony reign supreme. A national nirvana is not in the cards for America.

We have seen what happens in the arena of labor relations when strikes and lockouts and sabotage are replaced by orderly grievance procedures. Labor and management do not become sweethearts; opposing economic forces do not merge their goals. What does happen, in the best of times, is that the force of the antagonism is channeled through an institution that permits progress for all the antagonists.

In the same way, under the New Federalism, the relatively poor will not lose their envy of the rich. The States will not lose their reluctance to part with power to either the local or national government. The federal bureaucracy will not lose its capacity for either initiative or inertia. Tensions will continue to exist, and indeed they should exist—provided we can build those institutions that channel these tensions into progress for all. We are not slicing a pie, we are building a cathedral. Productive tension, the modern descendant of "divine discontent," is the mortar we need to build it.

One job of government in the final third of this century is to encourage competition among the centers of power without allowing it to become cutthroat competition and without taking the easy way out toward the monopoly of centralization. To abolish all tension would be to lose our freedom; we intend to harness tension and make it productive.

On the basis of the examples I have given you this evening I believe you can discern a strategy that is being put into action. It may be helpful to those who like to plot our future moves, because the New Federalism approach of this Administration has built in to government not only credibility, but predictability. It will be useful in doing what I said was needed at the beginning of my talk: in criticizing us about how well we do what we have set out to do.

The credo of the New Federalist, as I see it, is this:

We must act as one nation in determining national goals;

We must act as a federation of States and localities in meeting those goals, providing leeway for local option and individual diversity;

The Federal government and the courts must provide checks against any unfairness inflicted by local government, and local government must be able to provide checks against unfairness caused by national standards;

Power must be permitted to seek its own level of efficient response, flowing to that level of government closest to the people and willing and able to exercise it;

Local innovation and voluntary action must be aggressively encouraged, which limits the liability of the failure of worthwhile experiments and raises the chances of finding practical solutions;

We must reinstill a new respect for individual responsibility and personal freedom, recognizing that the dignity of work is the counterpart of human dignity;

The individual citizen must think and act on two levels: He must contribute to the determination of our national goals and then must involve himself locally in making those goals a reality where he lives.

This may not seem like a revolutionary credo, but if it is followed in our time, it could have the same revolutionary impact that followed the acceptance of the ideas of the original Federalists.

In spelling out the fundamental principles of a new approach to government, I have had to oversimplify. In actual operation, it is infinitely complex—far more complex, I submit, than a doctrinaire liberalism or conservatism.

These are some of the questions we face in putting these principles into practice:

What issues or problems lend themselves to national standards and which do not? For example, air and water pollution, crossing interstate lines, calls for a national approach—and an interstate highway system can hardly be developed on the basis of purely local initiative. On the other hand, a broad range of municipal and States services are better dealt with entirely at that level, assuming that these services can be adequately financed. That is what the President's proposed Revenue Sharing Plan is all about. Nevertheless, the question is a tough one and the answer is as tough, or perhaps complex, as the question itself.

Another complex question: How can we be sure, in the process of decentralization, that the local government can handle the job? To paraphrase a revolutionary slogan, decentralization without preparation is abdication. For example, we know it would be far more effective for local government to administer our manpower training programs. When you sit in Washington and pull the strings, you discover an awful lot of slack in almost every string. On the other hand—there's that phrase again—when you sit in Omaha and a Federal program is dumped in your lap, you are not likely to have the organization to make use of it effectively. What we have done in this situation is to set up a phased-in decentralization. Planning money is provided 90% by the Federal government; as soon as a State shows it has a plan to handle program administration, it gets administrative control of part of the program; as soon as that plan reaches a certain level of success, it earns a larger slice of control, until, at its own pace, it is ready to handle the entire administrative job.

Another complexity: How do we decentralize when local political boundaries make little economic sense? A labor market does not live within a city limits, and a transportation system doesn't end at the county line. For this reason, in many cases we have been encouraging metropolitanism, or regional planning, in an effort to help make the political system fit the problems it is called on to meet, and not the other way around.

Let me conclude with a reference that illustrates in a different way the spirit of the New Federalism.

Those of you who are familiar with industrial relations know about "the Hawthorne effect." Some years ago, experiments were conducted at the Hawthorne Works of the Western Electric Company in Chicago. These experiments dealt with the effect of different physical variables on productivity. One of these variables was the intensity of the lighting. The workers were told that the light level of their work area would be raised to see if productivity increased. It was, and it did, to the accompaniment of much attention to the experiment and the workers involved. The light was increased some more, and again productivity rose. Then somebody had the bright—or dim—idea of telling them the lighting would be lowered to its original level and, surprisingly enough, productivity still rose. This experience lead to the identification of the so-called "Hawthorne effect". The level of lighting wasn't nearly as important as the active participation and sense of importance of the workers in the experiment.

I have not told this story merely to revalidate my academic credentials. In government today, we are involving the people in an experiment to replace the deadening "Washington effect" with a constructive "Hawthorne effect". The very fact of our effort to try a new approach, a new experiment in government, involving the people in this experiment, should have a stimulating effect of its own and help make that experiment succeed.

That is what we, as a nation, are searching for. When this Administration is over—hopefully, in the year this nation reaches its 200th anniversary—we hope to have introduced new standards of fairness, new respect for diversity, and a new spirit of confidence in our system of government.

TO REDUCE U.S. TROOP STRENGTH IN EUROPE

HON. ABNER J. MIKVA

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Speaker, it is no secret that our massive military commitments abroad and our corroding domestic economy are intimately enmeshed problems. Both questions have taken up much of our time in these Chambers. We have fretted over the nature of our military goals overseas—how many troops, what kind, what for? We have dredged for sources of money to fund vital programs at home while decrying the dollar drain abroad. How many times we have talked and harangued and agonized about these problems, and felt helpless to really deal with either one.

Solutions are obviously not easy. But a beginning is possible. I am introducing today a resolution which calls simply and forthrightly for a reduction in numbers of our troops permanently stationed in Europe. It is similar to Senate Resolution, S. 292, introduced by Senator MANSFIELD and cosponsored by 48 Senators.

The security of the North Atlantic community from now on must depend on the responsible efforts of all its members, no longer on a disproportionate burden—both military and economic—carried by the United States.

From a military standpoint, this resolution does not imply a weakening of our position in NATO, nor is it any form of abandonment of our allies. Our support is still complete. It means only, and rightly so, that it has come time for European nations, after two decades now strong and able, to assume a greater share of responsibility for their own defense.

From an economic standpoint as well, this resolution acknowledges the incredible drain on our balance of payments by military and personal expenditures—$1.5 billion a year—into an already strong and growing European economy.

There is no justification at this stage of history, to have over a half-million troops, dependents and supportive personnel stationed in Europe. The political climate has considerably warmed from the time of our initial deployment. Transportation technology alone, not to mention advanced weaponry, has made such a massive deployment of men and supplies both unnecessary and untenable.

We must begin now to redeploy our troops to domestic bases from where, if they were needed anywhere in the world, they could be quickly transported. Not only would this greatly reduce the balance-of-payments deficit abroad, but could, with rational organization, pave the way for large total manpower cutbacks throughout the services. And I repeat, with rational organization, such a move would not at all have to weaken our international position, or threaten our ability to fulfill military commitments.

The point is, rational organization in the military, as in Government, does not come about overnight. And we have been too long overextended, and I might say, exploited on the European front. The sheer weight of our military contingent there is now not only obsolete, it has become a hinderance to our own national progress.

That meaningful planning for this European troop reduction might finally begin, I ask my colleagues to join in support of this resolution. I insert the text of the "sense of the House" resolution at this point in the RECORD:

H. RES. 894

Resolution to express the sense of the House of Representatives with respect to troop deployment in Europe

Whereas the foreign policy and military strength of the United States are dedicated to the protection of our national security, the preservation of the liberties of the American people; and the maintenance of world peace; and

Whereas the United States, in implementing these principles, has maintained large contingents of American Armed Forces in Europe, together with air and naval units, for twenty years; and

Whereas the security of the United States and its citizens remains interwoven with the security of other nations signatory to the North Atlantic Treaty as it was when the treaty was signed, but the condition of our

European allies, both economically and militarily, has appreciably improved since large contingents of forces were deployed; and

Whereas the means and capacity of all members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to provide forces to resist aggression has significantly improved since the original United States deployment; and

Whereas the commitment by all members of the North Atlantic Treaty is based upon the full cooperation of all treaty partners in contributing materials and men on a fair and equitable basis, but such contributions have not been forthcoming from all other members of the organization; and

Whereas relations between Eastern Europe and Western Europe were tense when the large contingents of United States forces were deployed in Europe but this situation has now undergone substantial change and relations between the two parts of Europe are now characterized by an increasing two-way flow of trade, people, and other peaceful exchange; and

Whereas the present policy of maintaining large contingents of United States forces and their dependents on the European Continent also contributes further to the fiscal and monetary problems of the United States: Now, therefore, be it resolved, that—

(1) it is the sense of the House of Representatives that, with changes and improvements in the techniques of modern warfare and because of the vast increase in capacity of the United States to wage war and to move military forces and equipment by air, a substantial reduction of United States forces permanently stationed in Europe can be made without adversely affecting either our resolve or ability to meet our commitment under the North Atlantic Treaty.

POSTAL WORKERS AND THE NIXON ADMINISTRATION

HON. ROBERT N. C. NIX

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. NIX. Mr. Speaker, the Philadelphia delegation feels that it is imperative that the public know its disagreement with what is being done to postal workers by the Nixon administration and we take our stand in these words.

We regret that the postal strike occurred, only because it is contrary to law. At the same time, we admire the courage of postal workers who believed they had no other recourse but to strike in order to bring their indecent wages to the public's attention.

Postal workers earn approximately $2,000 less than garbage collectors each year in many of our major cities.

We think it is important that the public know that President Nixon caused this strike when he threatened to veto any pay raise legislation for postal or Federal workers. He did say in December that he would agree to a small postal pay increase for some postal employees if employee unions would support his semiprivate postal corporation. This meant that he demanded that postal unions reverse their position before Congress and bring pressure to bear on their friends in Congress regardless of the fact that they opposed turning over a Government agency to a board of directors appointed by Nixon.

Mr. Nixon in his desire to turn the Post Office Department over to a semiprivate corporation, attempted to blackjack the Congress and postal unions.

His threatened veto of any decent pay legislation delayed any action on pay legislation for 4 months by a conference committee of the House and Senate until today, March 25, 1970. A decent pay bill, H.R. 13000, had passed both Houses of Congress in mid-December 1969. Only the Nixon veto threat made action by a House-Senate conference a worthless act. Now the Congress has decided to pass a pay bill regardless of a Presidential veto.

It is not necessary to talk about the injustice of Mr. Nixon's threats and acts. It is apparent.

Mr. Nixon's answer up until this time to the postal strike has been to send troops to New York City. A soldier who was working in the post office in New York described this act as a token gesture.

It is a token gesture standing for the employee-management policy of a President who is neither sympathetic or concerned about employees of the Federal Government.

We urge that the Congress pass H.R. 13000 delayed this past 4 months by President Nixon's threats. If he vetoes a decent pay bill, we will fight to override that veto. All of American labor is being challenged by President Nixon. He has shown once and for all his attitude toward American labor, through his actions against postal employees. If he is successful against employees of the Government he leads, he will set an example for corporate executives of intransigence that will lead to the worst work stoppages since the Second World War.

We must win. We will win together. The American people understand the plight of postal workers. Let President Nixon do his worst, while we do our best.

THE PROBLEM OF FOREIGN IMPORTS

HON. DURWARD G. HALL

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I have long been concerned about the impact of foreign shoe imports on the economy of the American shoe industry.

Imported shoes, made by low-paid workers earning as little as 60 cents an hour, have increased their share of the U.S. market to nearly 30 percent. This poses a threat to our entire shoe industry, including the jobs of thousands.

This is just one example, of the harm to one industry, caused by an almost unretricted flow of low cost and in some instances foreign national subsidized imported merchandise.

I am sure that many other American industries are feeling these same pressures. I have long felt the reciprocal trade and tariff agreement as amended by us, delegated our responsibility, and was the "root of all evil."

To those Members who are concerned about the whole problem of foreign imports, I offer the following article by O. R. Strackbein, president of the Nationwide Committee on Import-Export Policy.

The article follows:

REMARKS OF O. R. STRACKBEIN, PRESIDENT, NATIONWIDE COMMITTEE ON IMPORT-EXPORT POLICY

The foreign trade policy of this country has been running on a single one-way track for thirty-five years. The so-called Reciprocal Trade Program was first enacted in 1934. Under it our average tariff level has been reduced upward of 80%.

Far-reaching economic changes have occurred in this country and in other parts of the world during this long period of time. Yet the national trade policy continues with very little change, thus ignoring the altered conditions that have in the meantime greatly affected international competition.

The President seeks further tariff-cutting authority even though our average tariff is less than 20% of what it was thirty-five years ago, when the tariff-cutting was inaugurated. The full cuts agreed to under the Kennedy Round still have 60% of the way to go before their final installment is completed. Therefore the full effects of these cuts have not made themselves felt. Why then extend further authority now to cut what will be left of the tariff in 1972?

The principal economic changes that have transformed the competitive standing of this country in point of both imports and exports in recent years can no longer be successfully concealed, as they have been over the years by false governmental reporting of trade statistics. The competitive tide has been running so strongly against us in recent years that efforts to conceal our weak international competitive standing have come a cropper. Today the handsome trade surplus that measured from $4 to $7 billion annually until the past two years has all but disappeared despite the padded statistical device used by the Department of Commerce under which it included Foreign Aid shipments as exports.

The inclusion of goods paid for by the American taxpayer as exports made it possible to point to our trade policy as a great success whereas we were falling increasingly behind in our competitive exports. At the same time the official statistics showed our imports at their foreign value without including ocean freight and other charges. This practice is contrary to that of nearly all the other leading trading nations. The practice understates the actual costs of our imports by some 10%.

Today what appears to be a trade surplus of the magnitude of about a billion dollars is really a deficit in terms of competitive goods. This deficit is in the magnitude of $4 to $5 billion.

By hiding or ignoring these uncomfortable facts, the present Administration is able, no less than the preceding Administration was able, to propose further tariff reductions, as if other countries needed further inducement to increase their sales in this country. That no such inducement was or is necessary may be concluded from the upward surge of imports in recent years, especially in the form of manufactured goods.

One of our heaviest export items consists of machinery. From 1960–68 our exports of this item doubled (moving from $4.4 billion in 1960 to $8.8 billion in 1968). Imports of machinery, by contrast, increased over 5-fold, (moving from $0.7 billion in 1960 to $3.7 billion in 1968). This still left a high margin in favor of exports, but the trend is unmistakable, and it has been running very rapidly. Indeed machinery, including the sophisticated products of electronic origin, together with chemicals and aircraft, represent the only important surplus items in exports. An astoundingly wide variety of other products are incurring deficits in varying degrees. The public is little aware of our very weak competitive position.

Such buoyancy as our exports show today is virtually confined to the narrow sector just mentioned. In 1968 we enjoyed an export surplus in these few products of $9.3 billion. Little wonder that some of these industries support the continuing tariff-cutting program!

Compare this record with that of the products classified by the Bureau of the Census as "Other Manufactured Goods." In that group, which includes iron and steel mill products, textiles, clothing, paper and manufactures, rubber manufactures, metal manufactures, photographic supplies, glassware, pottery, boots and shoes, clocks and watches, bicycles, toys, sporting goods, motorcycles, etc., a deficit instead of a surplus was shown in 1968. This deficit was one of $5.473 billion. As recently as 1960 this deficit was only $760 million or about 1/7 of its 1968 magnitude. (Source: Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1969.)

At the same time our surplus in the machinery, chemicals, aircraft exports grew only a little over 60% from 1960–68.

This simply means that while we had a moderate increase in our trade surplus in the front-running group we suffered a disastrous increase in our trade deficit in the much broader group of "Other Manufactured Goods."

These realities of our changing trade trends are wholly ignored by the thrust of our continuing trade policy.

In 1968 the number of workers employed in turning out the "Other Manufactured Goods" was nearly 2 million higher than those engaged in manufacturing machinery, chemicals and aircraft. Yet it was in the former group that we suffered the heavy trade deficit. A deficit of this magnitude (i.e., of over $5.4 billion), having widened since 1960 so dramatically (seven-fold), reflects a sharp deterioration of our competitive position.

Evidently the trade advisers of the White House have failed to bring these facts to the President's attention. Otherwise the President could not propose further tariff reductions.

Beyond the trade trend in recent years represented by the statistics cited here, which pose a threat of disaster to industries that employ over 7½ million workers, another shift in our trade mix has taken place. It too carries ominous implications. In 1950 only 27½% of our imports consisted of manufactured goods. During the 1936–40 period the share was $32.8%. In 1968 the share was approximately 65%. In other words, our imports have shifted heavily toward goods incorporating a full complement of labor application. The impact on unemployment is therefore twice as great as formerly. In this country employment in manufacturing is of a ratio of about 3½ to 1 in relation to employment in agriculture, mining, fishing and lumbering, which produce our raw materials. Our imports today therefore offer a sharper threat to our employment than in the past.

Measured in relation to exports of all other countries American exports, including foreign aid, have lost ground in recent years. This means simply that exports of other countries have expanded more rapidly than U.S. exports. In turn this suggests that their goods are more competitively priced in world markets. In 1960 our share of world exports was 15%; in 1967 it was 14.5%. Had our exports in 1967 enjoyed the same proportion of world exports as in 1960 we would have exported $4.6 billion more in 1967 than we did export, or $35.8 billion instead of $31.2 billion. (See United Nations Statistical Yearbook, 1968.)

The irrebutable fact is that we are in a weak competitive position in world markets and in our own market vis a vis imports.

The trend since 1960 is unmistakable. A trade policy that was based on competitive conditions as they existed before 1960 is no longer in focus. It is unrealistic.

What does our weak competitive position suggest with respect to our trade policy?

The problem of import competition would be more acute than it is were it not for the $30 billion annual boost to our economy provided by our Viet Nam involvement. Since our tariff has been cut to an ineffective level without present hope of reversal some other instrument for control of our market-and-employment erosion attributable to imports must be provided.

The establishment of import ceilings with a backstop of import quotas as provided in the Fair International Trade bill, represents both a reasonable and a moderate and effective approach. That bill provides for expansion of imports in proportion to domestic consumption, and in most instances, calls for acceptance of the attained level of imports.

It has been introduced in the Senate by the Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and in the House by over 45 Members, including four Committee Chairmen.

Enactment of this legislation would provide assurance that imports, despite their cost advantage resulting from lower wages, will not be allowed to run wild and thus disrupt industry after industry. Instead of relying on first aid ministration in the form of adjustment assistance, the injury to our employment and industrial expansion would be controlled ahead of time. Imports would not be awarded the right of eminent domain in our market but would be given the opportunity to grow in proportion to domestic consumption.

We face an opportunity to adopt a trade policy that would achieve the undoubted benefits of world trade without incurring its unfair and destructive impact on a widening front.

PRESIDENT OF THE CHICAGO BOARD OF TRADE SUPPORTS LIBERALIZATION OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE

HON. CHESTER L. MIZE

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. MIZE. Mr. Speaker, President Henry H. Wilson of the Chicago Board of Trade is widely respected as an expert on international trade.

His views on agricultural trade, as reported in the Journal of Commerce on Tuesday, February 17, 1970, should be of interest to all Members of Congress. The article follows:

LIBERALIZING OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE, END OF FARMING PROTECTIONISM URGED

(By Henry H. Wilson)

CHICAGO.—The agribusiness leaders, opinion makers, and politically influential men of the world have a responsibility to liberalize international trade and to end agricultural protectionism.

That is the opinion of Henry H. Wilson, president of the Chicago Board of Trade, world's largest commodities exchange, where 80 per cent of all world grain futures are traded.

"The agricultural sector of our own country has always been in the forefront of the movement to liberalize our trade policies. This is readily understood when one looks at the impact of exports on agricultural products throughout the United States."

EXPORTS PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT

Every state in the United States, with the exception of Alaska, exports agricultural products. Production of one out of every four crop land acres is exported. Exports provide employment for one out of every eight farm workers and account for 17 cents out of the farmer's market dollar.

"We have found from time to time, that such a liberalization policy may have a self-destructive effect—but only in the short run," Mr. Wilson said. "Over the long term, a free trade policy has been most effective on political and economic levels at home and abroad."

Looking at the Japanese-American grain trade policy, Mr. Wilson said: "It is common knowledge that, while the United States' exports to Japan have increased over the past decade, Japan's exports to the U.S. have increased at an even greater rate. The result has been a balance of trade surplus in favor of Japan of about $1.4 billion during 1968, and the surplus in 1969 was even greater.

"REASONS FOR TRADE DEFICIT

"One of the reasons for the large U.S. trade deficit is that agricultural sales to Japan in 1968 were down from the prior year, totaling approximately $900 million. This is, of course, of particular concern to the agribusiness community.

"In 1968, agricultural sales totalled 32 per cent of all U.S. exports to Japan and recent reports established by the Japanese Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry indicate that Japan's need for agricultural imports will continue to rise," he said.

"This is due to the fact that in Japan there are now 100 million people living on a land area smaller than that of the state of Montana and that this land is only 15 per cent arable. These reports indicate that, by 1977, the rise in import needs will include 86 per cent more soybeans, about 22 per cent more wheat, 67 per cent more feed grains, and sharp increases in many other products. The increase expectations are due, in part, to a higher intake of animal-protein foods.

JAPAN'S MEAT CONSUMPTION

"Still, Japan's per capita meat and poultry consumption remains below 25 pounds a year—near the average for all of East Asia, but far below that of Western Europe and of the United States," he added.

He explained that, by comparison, the average American consumed 228 pounds of meat and poultry last year.

"If Japan's per capita meat consumption were raised just to the 31 pound per capita average in Taiwan alone, an additional 825 thousand tons of meat would be required. At existing grain-meat rations, Japan would need approximately 4.7 million tons of feed grain. It would be, of course, presumptuous of us to ask the Japanese to 'eat more meat,' but that may well be a natural response to the Japanese unparalleled real per capita growth," he said.

GROWTH IN JAPAN

In 1967–68 that growth in Japan was 12½ per cent. Japan's increased livestock and poultry industry activity has been only one result, he said.

All these factors combined to support an estimate that Japanese grain import needs by 1985 could be more than double those in 1966, which were 11 million tons. And, if trade conditions were to remain constant until 1985, our supply of grain to Japan would double, as well, benefiting our agribusiness outlook, he said.

"The fact is, of course, that conditions rarely remain so constant, and the United States is faced with stiffening competition from other countries to supply Japan's needs.

FEED GRAIN EXPORT MARKET

"In recent years, the United States has held 50 per cent of the world's feed grain export market. Our share declined last year with exports at a level of only 18.2 million short tons—out of total world exports of 44 million tons. The export picture would be much brighter except for the over-supply of wheat in the world," Mr. Wilson said.

Carryover stocks of wheat in the five principal exporting nations totaled about 2 billion bushels at the end of the 1968–69 marketing year—an increase of some 620 million bushels from the previous season. This is the third straight year that world stocks have increased.

"The oversupply of wheat in the world is creating a multitude of problems in the international wheat trade. There has been price-cutting by all exporters and the United States has had to make adjustments in its own pricing under the International Grains Agreement.

"Complicating the wheat trade situation has been the fact that the EEC is providing 50 cents a bushel to subsidize greater feed-use of wheat. This subsidization has cut sharply into their traditional grain imports. In fact, feed manufacturers in some countries have begun to substitute cheap wheat rather than corn or soghum for feed," Mr. Wilson said.

He indicated that soybean production has had tremendous growth in the U.S. for the past 15 years, due in large part to the many new uses found for soybean products.

In Illinois alone, the harvested acreage of soybeans has increased in 15 years from around 4 million acres to around 6½ million acres.

GOVERNMENT'S POLICY

"Our government's policy has been to encourage this growth with price supports, and in 1966 the price support was established at $2.50 a bushel. This proved an unrealistically high price support, and soybeans lost potential markets to competitive products," he said.

"A decision was made in 1969 to lower the price support and make the price more competitive, a long-term benefit to soybean farmers. The anticipated result of this reduction for soybeans will be that, during the present year, 100 per cent of the crop will be utilized, whereas two years ago, only 87 per cent of the crop was utilized," Mr. Wilson said.

He feels that a free international trade is essential for our country's soybean market, and the price support reduction of last year should further stimulate utilization.

33 CENTS PER BUSHEL LEVY

"With the hope that the advantage of our lower price support could be passed on to consumers throughout the free world, it is very important that other governments remove their levies on soybeans. Returning again to our example, Japan has such a levy of 33 cents per bushel," he said, adding:

"During the Kennedy Round negotiation, under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, such levies were under discussion and Japan obligated herself to remove half of the levy by 1971. It would be advantageous to all if even more of the levy were removed, and if other countries followed suit.

"In order, then, for a truly free international market to exist, it would be necessary for all countries of the free world to take two vital steps: First, subsidization of agricultural products should be reduced where possible. Secondly, import levies should be lowered to the point that exporting of grains and feed would be stimulated."

REVISED REGULATIONS

Steps by the U.S. government to ease free international trade are already underway, and the U.S. Department of Commerce recently revised its regulations to eliminate the requirement that applications for licenses to export agricultural commodities to Communist Bloc nations in Eastern Europe must include a statement that the sale of such commodities does not include barter.

Late last year, Mr. Wilson said, the Department of Agriculture added Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia and Hungary to the list of countries to which agricultural commodities may be exported under the barter program. This revision had no meaning until the Commerce Department provided that licenses would be granted on exports to these countries under barter arrangements.

"This step in freeing restrictions on trade in grain and other agricultural commodities with the nations of Eastern Europe is a modest one," Mr. Wilson said. "But it is a step in the right direction. A greater step, taken by many countries appears to be unrealistically optimistic at this time, but there can be no doubt that all countries participating in such a program would benefit greatly."

"The steps recommended here must be enforced by our own nation, before we can ask the cooperation of others, and leaders of the U.S. agribusiness community must first deal with our own government to both reduce the burden of other nations from which we are importing and to lessen the assistance to our farmers, in order to put them in a more competitive situation in the free world trade," he added.

JUDICIAL QUALIFICATIONS

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, I have been deeply disappointed in the continued delay and apparent lack of action by the California State Judicial Qualifications Commission in considering the serious allegations of improper conduct and gross ethnic discrimination made against Judge Gerald S. Chargin of the Superior Court in Santa Clara County, Calif.

The allegations arose as a result of statements made by Judge Chargin at a juvenile court hearing held in San Jose, Calif., of September 2, 1969.

According to the court reporter's official transcript of the hearing, which I have had an opportunity to review, Judge Chargin's remarks from the bench amounted to what can only be called an outrageous and insulting ethnic slur against the entire Mexican American community in the United States.

I have communicated repeatedly to the chairman of the Judicial Qualifications Commission to protest in the strongest terms possible the intemperate bigotry and bias shown by Judge Chargin, and to urge his immediate removal from judicial office as having disqualified himself from continuing to sit on the bench.

The inexcusable and offensive language used by Judge Chargin, which I will not dignify by repeating in this forum, is simply unacceptable to the people of this country, and has no place whatsoever in a civilized court of law.

His remarks attempt to perpetuate profound misunderstanding about the Mexican American community, its rich cultural heritage, its highest aspirations, and its many significant contributions to American life.

In my opinion, Judge Chargin stands convicted by his own words as clearly unfit to serve in any judicial capacity. and he should be removed from the bench forthwith.

IT IS ESSENTIAL IN THE NATIONAL INTEREST TO REDUCE INTEREST RATES NOW

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, the people of America are pleading for Federal action to reduce interest rates, and although it is never easy to predict the judgment of history, Congress must take action now. There can be little doubt that economic historians of the future will look back upon 1969 as a year of the most painful inflation since World War II and the Korean war. In some respects it was even more serious than the inflations of the latter 1940's and early 1950's. This was particularly true with respect to the staggering increase in interest rates. As the Economic Report of the President coldly sets forth, page 35:

> In fact interest rates did soar in 1969. By the end of 1969, most interest rates had climbed around 4 percentage points above their 1965 level. One must consult records for the Civil War and earlier to find comparable interest rates. And the steepness of the advance, on long-term as well as short-term securities, may well have been unprecedented.

Paradoxical as it may appear, these high interest rates can be considered in part as contributing toward inflation, and in part as a weapon to combat it. To the extent that high interest rates effectively shut off certain segments of the economy, such as housing, from ready access to the money market, their demand for funds were of course curtailed. However, segments of the economy which had reason to believe that they could profitably push up prices even more than the hike in interest rates, those with monopolistic power, or those with a virtually guaranteed market, could take advantage of the higher interest rates, at the expense of the economy as a whole.

That high interest rates have, thus far, not had any appreciable effect in slowing down the rise in consumer prices is clearly demonstrable. That they have had a severe effect on housing is equally clear. The combination of steadily increasing building and land costs on the one hand and of shrinkage of mortgage money on the other has led to a serious shrinkage of the housing market. It is hardly surprising therefore, that new housing starts in 1969 were 4 percent under the total for 1968, and that January 1970 housing starts were a full 36 percent under the total for January 1969. And the outlook for the rest of 1970 is bleak indeed. This is a particularly serious matter when we reflect on the large and growing unsatiated demand for decent housing. The situation has long been critical in many central cities, and among low income families everywhere. Now with a surge in new family formations, the demand will be severe even at middle- and higher-income levels.

High interest rates have also had a serious impact on construction of essential public facilities, Federal, State, and local. The crisis of the cities has been too loudly proclaimed to require elaboration here. The call for massive public expenditures to preserve and enhance a healthy environment is only just beginning in intensity. Clearly, governments are not in a position, in community after community across the land, to float bond issues needed to undertake the projects essential to their health, education, and economy. The Federal Government itself is finding it necessary to cut back on assistance to many undertakings which have become unconscionably expensive as a result of high interest costs.

Now we are finding that high interest rates are having an increasingly severe impact on other segments of the private economy, beyond housing and construction. February unemployment rose to a seasonally adjusted 4.2 percent of the civilian labor force, up from 3.5 percent only 2 months earlier; this was the sharpest rise since the 1957 recession and the highest rate since October 1965. Demand for automobiles has slackened appreciably, and the picture is similar for other consumer durable goods and, of course, consequently for such raw materials as steel.

There is no doubt that the economy has reached a point where an imminent recession is more than outside chance. If the stringencies imposed by existing interest rates continue, it will become close to a certainty.

Therefore, it is important for the Government, and in particular the Federal Reserve Board, to take steps promptly to insure a lowering of interest rates to a level more appropriate to the present needs of the economy. Arthur Burns, the new chairman of the Board, indicated to the Senate Commitee on Banking and Currency this week, March 16, that he believed that the bank prime interest rate would come down this year, and hoped that "it comes fairly soon." In view of the deteriorating economic situation, it is important to do more than hope. Action to make funds more readily available for essential purposes at a reasonable cost needs to be taken now.

MAN'S INHUMANITY TO MAN—HOW LONG?

HON. WILLIAM J. SCHERLE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. SCHERLE. Mr. Speaker, a child asks: "Where is daddy?" A mother asks: "How is my son?" A wife asks: "Is my husband alive or dead?"

Communist North Vietnam is sadistically practicing spiritual and mental genocide on over 1400 American prisoners of war and their families.

TESTIMONY OF ARTIST ROBERT MOTHERWELL ON ENVIRONMENTAL EDUCATION

HON. JOHN BRADEMAS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, the Select Subcommittee on Education has just completed its first 2 days of testimony on H.R. 14753, the Environmental Quality Education Act.

This measure authorizes support for curriculum development for environmental education courses in elementary and secondary schools, programs of environmental education for community leaders, and a variety of other programs to provide greater knowledge of environmental problems to our citizens.

Our first 2 days of testimony have produced some extraordinarily eloquent testimony from ecologists, students, artists, and theologians on the subject of environmental deterioration and its consequences for all Americans.

Because the remedies for our environmental crisis will necessarily involve changes in the attitudes which many of us have toward our surroundings, the first day of hearings was concentrated on questions of the values of human life.

A particularly eloquent statement was that of the distinguished American artist, Robert Motherwell, who discussed the world we have made for ourselves and the effect of the physical environment on human behavior and attitudes.

I believe that Members of Congress will read with great interest Mr. Motherwell's observations. I, therefore, insert the text of his testimony, delivered on March 24, 1970, at this point in the RECORD:

TESTIMONY BEFORE THE SELECT SUBCOMMITTEE ON EDUCATION, MARCH 24, 1970

(By Robert Motherwell)

I am sure that scientists have or will testify to the relevant facts here, and know them far better than I. I speak only as an artist, but to speak as an artist is no small thing. Most people ignorantly suppose that artists are the decorators of our human existence, true aesthetes to whom the cultivated may turn when the real business of the day is done. But actually what an artist is is a person skilled in expressing human feeling, and if the "real" business of the day has led to a distortion or petrification of human feeling on the part of the participants—as for example, when a builder mows down the trees on a tract of land because it is easier and cheaper to build houses on barren ground, and the worker who drives the tractor that plows down the trees to do his job in order to race home for a Budweiser and a TV Western does it oblivious of the hurt to the landscape, and the hurt to the ultimate house buyer who, if he has sensibility and limited means, will plant saplings that will take a generation or two or three to reach the stature of the trees torn down in a few minutes—then we are dealing with a business of the day that makes the building and the worker looking later at a masterpiece of landscape painting—say, a Constable or Monet—in a museum, a cultural transaction so grotesque and absurd that the most extreme plays of Ionesco or Samuel Beckett are less absurd than everyday life itself.

A great modern playwright has said that he has only felt happy when drunk, as millions of younger people now seem only happy when drugged. Which are two ways of contending with the nausea that a person of sensibility must feel when he looks at the waste of modern civilization covering the landscape like a slimy coating of vomit. What kind of a race of men is it who can rape or vomit on the landscape by the millions, like drunken soldiers in a conquered village, or destructive and greedy little boys let loose in an enormous toy and candy store, to break and gorge as they like? While other little boys in other parts of this planet that we Americans are turning into a garbage dump stand with a piece of string and an orange rind as their treasures.

THE ARTIST'S RESPONSE TO THE ENVIRONMENT

As an artist I am used to being regarded as a somewhat eccentric maker of refined but rather unintelligible objects of perception. Actually those objects contain a murderous rage in black and white forms at what passes for the business of everyday life—a life so dehumanized, so atrophied in its sensibility that it cannot even recognize a statement as subtle and complicated as the human spirit it is meant to represent—as well as at other times an expressor of adoration for the miracle of a world that has colors, meaningful shapes, and spaces that can exhibit the real expansion of the human spirit, as it moves and has its being. But as every artist knows, this is expressed in the middle of, and despite the vomit that surrounds us, a nauseous waste that makes the incessant and endless chewing down of trees by beavers seem amateurish and almost benign, said they do not have the technology that we humans do to destroy on a huge scale. If we gave beavers our tools, the forests of the world would disappear in one day. We are slightly more sensitive: it might take us a generation or two. Or again, perhaps not. We are also capable of destroying the forests of the world, of destroying everything that is not already covered with vomit, as well as everything that is, in one day.

NO MORE FRONTIERS

I suppose America began as a few people on a vast tract of land, so vast that one could be as greedy and wasteful as one wanted, and there was still more. That time is gone. Now there are millions of people and millions more in the offing, and that vast land is becoming more like the scale of a park humanly speaking, but a park filled with waste—rusting cars, bottles, garbage, enormous signs seducing you to buy what you don't want or need, housing projects that don't show a rudimentary sense of proportion in any shape or line or material—suburbs that are a parody of the barrenness of the Bronx and the gaudiness of Las Vegas. Indeed, if God had said to a group of men, "Here is a vast park of millions of square miles. Let's see how quickly you can cover it with everything that is an affront to the human spirit, and above all be certain that it is done on a scale of such extravagance and waste and lack of regard for the sensibilities of the inhabitants of the other parks in the world, then we might by definition call that group of men that God so addressed Americans.

THE RESPONSE OF YOUTH

No wonder our youth are up in arms! They are so to preserve their sanity, in the midst of a vulgarity, a waste, a contamination without precedent in the annals of mankind. We talk about a "generation gap". I am more optimistic. I prefer to think of it as a "sanity gap," of a young generation saying in the interests of a growing sensibility that they certainly did not inherit from their parents, to their elders, "The way you go on covering our natural park with filth, waste, and vomit for the sake of monetary gain and monetary economy is insane." If most of the members of Congress think that they are either leading or in touch with the young, I would remind them of a masterpiece of Renaissance painting by Peter Brueghel the Elder called, "The Blind Leading the Blind." Congress may be leading or mirroring the so-called "silent majority," but all persons of human sensibility are regarding this scene of vomit with the only sane response, nausea, and no man, if they can cure it, will endure a state of nausea for long.

I do not know how you legislate the growth of human awareness, or how you can make shameful insensitivity to our landscape. But if the present bill can in any way do either or both, who could not favor it? Each of us lives a brief moment in what was once a primordially beautiful park that could only elicit a sense of ecstasy and natural music that of a virgin place. Does that moment for us now have to be spent surrounded by our own filth? So much of it that it is a problem to cast it away? What kind of a human existence is that? A gift to our children? No, it is a dirty joke and a senseless one, and not God's but our own. The old cliche, the word "mess", is now taking on a vivid and literal meaning. The American landscape is visibly and literally a mess, outsiders and the young know it. Let us give them all our positive knowledge. It is little enough, compared to the mess we have given them. For if you want to drive anyone insane, rear them in an environment without a sense of limits. Because even our vast reality is limited indeed.

THE ABSENCE OF FEELING

One's mind reels at what men without an esthetic sensibility have been capable of. Far from being merely decorative, the artist's awareness, with its sense of proportion and harmony, is one of the few guardians of the inherent sanity and equilibrium of the human spirit that we have. Keat's famous line that "truth is beauty, beauty is truth" should be regarded as an obvious fact, not an enigma. What is enigmatic is that a whole society—and our modern technological one, which we cannot lose if we would, is the first such one in human history—that a whole society can think it flourishes, when in fact its mountains of waste matter reveal a paralyzed and psychopathic—in having no feeling—lack of response to the wonderously complex and sensitive perceptions that are the human spirit itself. What have we gained in conquering a virgin piece of nature if, in the process, we have destroyed the sensibility with which the human spirit perceives the world, that is, if we have destroyed our capacity to feel? Everyone knows that absence of feeling is the prime characteristic of death. A lot of what we observe among the young these days is their various reactions to moving about in an environment devoid of basic feeling so as to better manipulate nature in the interests of greed. In short, from moving about in an environment that is deathlike. If they go to extremes in their efforts to revivify our environment, it can only be because of the mortal threat to their lives and states of being that our landscape represents.

The French Surrealists liked to think of themselves as Super realists. In fact they were sub-realists in their realism, compared to the nightmare of the aesthetic reality that we patriotic Americans have made for ourselves, without sensibility or plan. The French have managed to ingrain into a whole culture a sensibility to what one eats. Each meal is a job. I would that we would do the same in relation to the American landscape. How enhanced all our individual lives would be!

BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. JAMES J. HOWARD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, today we pay tribute to a dream. March 25, brings the celebration of the 52d anniversary of Byelorussian Independence. Unfortunately, this is no longer a celebration of fact, as is our 4th of July, but it is rather the remembrance of a fact, and the celebration of a hope.

During the decade prior to World War I, the Byelorussian people, who had been ruled by the Russians, began to redevelop their own nation culture and language. This cultural revival was later to have distinct political relevance as well.

The outbreak of World War I created unique opportunities for those non-Russian peoples residing along the borderlands between the Russian Empire and Europe proper. The Byelorussians, like the Ukranians, Lithuanians, Estonians, and others within the empire, seized the opportunity provided by the confusion of war and revolution, to establish their own national independence.

Despite German occupation during the war, the Byelorussians were able to carry on their political work, as well as continuing the rejuvenation of their culture and language. These brave people developed a new sense of nationalism, and felt able to once again hold their heads high in national pride and effort.

During 1917 and 1918, the Byelorussian people developed a democratic constitution and, on March 25, 1918, they declared their independence and set up a government at Minsk, the capital city. After the declaration of independence, the government and the people set to work, and made significant advances in the fields of education, culture, and social welfare. This was accomplished at great risk, and despite the fact their fragile independence was dependent upon the fortunes of war and the occupying military forces.

With the end of the war and the disolution of the German armed forces, the Red army advanced into Byelorussia, and on December 10, 1918, seized Minsk. In 1921, the Treaty of Riga divided the Byelorussian territory and the efforts of the Byelorussian National Republic were defeated.

Today, however, the 8 million Byelorussian people still hope that they will once again have the opportunity to develop and take their place as a free nation among men. We must, as we give thanks for our own freedom, continue to pray that this captive nation may once again share in the freedom which we believe to be rightfully theirs.

COMMUNISM—JUST HOW MUCH IS THE FACE CHANGING?

HON. JOHN WOLD

OF WYOMING

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. WOLD. Mr. Speaker, the historic confrontation between West German Chancellor Willy Brandt and East German Premier Willi Stoph in Erfurt, Germany, March 19, produced a side effect the Communists had not counted on.

As described in a concise article by Christian Science Monitor staff correspondent Harry B. Ellis, the East German officials in this first of its kind meeting "perceived clearly how much pro-Brandt—and quite possibly anti-Communist—sentiment has been waiting an opportunity for expression among East Germans."

Mr. Ellis continues, writing that the Communist official, taken back by the spontaneous outpourings of warmth for Brandt:

Hastily arranged for a counterdemonstration of party faithful, calling for recognition of East Germany and for an end to the ban on the Communist Party in West Germany. But the damage, from the East German point of view, had been done. Dozens of Western reporters had been engulfed by the people calling for Willy Brandt and had recorded their enthusiasm on film and tape.

Here was the tip of an iceberg of emotion, suddenly exposed. This was the first opportunity in years which ordinary East Germans had had to express how they felt about Mr. Brandt and, by implication, about their own regime and German unity.

Mr. Speaker, I insert the Christian Science Monitor account of the "Dialog of the Germanys—Act 1" in the RECORD with my remarks at this point:

DIALOGUE OF THE GERMANYS—ACT 1

(By Harry B. Ellis)

ERFURT, GERMANY.—Thousands of East German citizens chanting "Willy Brandt" changed the character of the historic all-German summit just concluded in Erfurt.

Surging through police lines and demanding a glimpse of the visiting West German leader, the cheering crowd hinted at the pressures bubbling below the rigidly controlled surface of East German life.

Obviously taken aback, Communist officials hastily arranged a counterdemonstration of party faithful, calling for recognition of East Germany and for an end to the ban on the Communist Party in West Germany.

But the damage, from the East German point of view, had been done. Dozens of Western reporters had been engulfed by the people calling for Willy Brandt and had recorded their enthusiasm on film and tape.

An East German woman in the crush behind me simply whispered "Willy, Willy," when the Chancellor appeared briefly at a window in the Erfurter Hof, the hotel across from the railroad station where Mr. Brandt conferred with his host, East German Premier Willi Stoph.

The Chancellor stood quietly, sober-faced, by no motion of hand or body trying to excite the crowd.

His restraint was proper. No one knew better than Mr. Brandt that there was nothing he could do to help these people, once his special train had pulled out of Erfurt and crossed the border into the federal republic.

Indeed, his desire to lighten human burdens in divided Germany may have been struck a blow, by the very enthusiasm with which he was greeted by ordinary people in Erfurt.

East German officials perceived clearly how much pro-Brandt—and quite possibly anti-Communist—sentiment had been awaiting an opportunity for expression among East Germans.

"NEXT ACT" IN WEST GERMANY

All along Mr. Brandt's journey through East Germany, observers on the train reported, people waved handkerchiefs from windows and at grade crossings.

The Walter-Ulbricht-Willi Stoph team is highly unlikely to give Mr. Brandt and East Germans direct exposure to each other again, much less allow East German citizens to travel freely to West Germany, as the Chancellor would like.

Mr. Ulbricht is the veteran Moscow-trained Communist who, as chief of state and first secretary of the Socialist Unity (Communist) Party, has led East Germany since its establishment in 1949.

The next act in the developing all-German dialogue will unfold on West German soil, when Mr. Stoph travels to the town of Kassel to meet with Mr. Brandt on May 21.

A continuation of the dialogue had been Mr. Brandt's chief aim at the Erfurt meeting, the first time since Word War II that government chiefs of the two Germanys had met face to face.

All indications were that Mr. Stoph, during the six hours he conferred with his West German guest, stuck closely to the familiar list of East German demands, centering on full diplomatic recognition of East Germany by Bonn.

Mr. Brandt, in return, suggested the formation of "commissions" by both governments, to continue technical discussions at the beginning of what the Chancellor called the "long and arduous road" that lay ahead.

He offered to make available to such an East German commission "appropriate permanent working possibilities" in Bonn.

On his return to Bonn Mr. Brandt told the West German Parliament that the Erfurt meeting had been "important, necessary, and useful."

For those who witnessed the surging crowd of young men and women, workers and students at Erfurt—not "hippies and old ladies" as one East German source put it—the human drama was high.

Here was the tip of an iceberg of emotion, suddenly exposed. This was the first opportunity in years which ordinary East Germans had had to express how they felt about Mr. Brandt and, by implication, about their own regime and German unity.

OPPOSING G. HARROLD CARSWELL FOR THE SUPREME COURT

HON. ABNER J. MIKVA

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Speaker, I have spoken out before in opposition to the nomination of Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court of the United States. But like so many others who have spoken on this issue, I fear that I have not really touched the central objection. In all the debate and discussion, the real problem with Judge Carswell has been politely obscured. Perhaps out of deference to the man's feelings, perhaps out of an understandable desire to focus the debate on a man's record rather than his personality, we have been passing over the central reason that Judge Carswell is unqualified.

Mr. Speaker, Judge Carswell is too unknowledgeable to sit on the Supreme Court of the United States. I have chosen my words carefully here. I use unknowledgeable not as an epithet, not to cast doubt on the man's college or his law school, but in the purest sense of the word. Judge Carswell is too unknowledgeable for the Court because he is, to use Webster's words, "uninstructed, uninformed, unaware."

When I assert that Judge Carswell is unknowledgeable, I do not mean to limit that to matters of law. Certainly the man's judicial qualifications have long since been shown inadequate—the endorsement of 12 members of the ABA committee on the Federal judiciary notwithstanding. As this morning's Washington Post indicated, a man with an affirmance rate on appeal of civil cases of 34 percent simply does not know the law. So the question of Judge Carswell's ignorance of the law is well documented.

But what is even more distressing is the nominee's ignorance of the society and the world around him. To use two of Webster's synonyms, the judge is both uninformed and unaware. A man who can tell a blatantly racist joke after the agony of the civil rights struggle in this country is uninformed about the spirit of this Nation. A Federal district judge who would participate in the organization of a segregated golf club after the supreme judicial tribunal in the land had declared that equal protection of the law prohibits such activities is unaware of the responsbilities of his office.

The tragedy of nominating an unknowledgeable man to the Supreme Court of the United States is heightened in the case of Harrold Carswell. The tragedy is heightened because of the history of the seat for which this unknowledgeable man has been nominated. As former Justice Arthur Goldberg said last weekend, this is one of the original seats on the Supreme Court. In this seat sat men such as Joseph Story, author of treatises on constitutional law and equity which are still cited today more than a century after they were written, one of the first teachers at the Harvard Law School. In Story's seat later sat perhaps the finest intellect ever to serve on the Court, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes: A scholar, the long-time chief justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, a writer of judicial opinions so profound and so far ahead of their times that today we are still citing Justice Holmes' dissents long after the majority opinions he opposed have been forgotten. After the "Yankee from Olympus" there came from New York the Justice with the finest command of language on the High Court in this century: Benjamin Cardozo. Cardozo, distinguished legal scholar, author of the justly celebrated work on "The Nature of the Judicial Process," and New York State court judge, brought his robust, stately prose to the service of the Nation for an all too brief 7 years. What lawyer will ever forget the ringing phrases of Cardozo in cases like Paulsgraf and Palko against Connecticut?

After Cardozo came Harvard Law School professor and legal activist Felix Frankfurter. By the time he was appointed to the Court, Frankfurter had written his defense of Sacco and Vanzetti, had argued cases before the Supreme Court, had staffed the New Deal with brilliant lawyers from across the Nation. Frankfurter had helped to draft the Norris-LaGuardia Anti-Injunction Act. Frankfurter was the Justice who, upon taking the seat vacated by Cardozo, founded that school of judicial interpretation which has now become so venerated by those who would destroy everything for which Felix Frankfurter stood. Frankfurter was the father of the philosophy of "judicial restraint," a philosophy so important that it dominated an entire era of the Court's work.

These, then, are the predecessor's that Harrold Carswell has been nominated to succeed. These are the men who have through the years sat in that high place. When we think back over the history of that seat, who can honestly disagree with the judgment of former Justice Goldberg who also sat in that seat: Harrold Carswell is not fit to serve in that seat.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that we as a Nation are benefitting from the delay in the Senate's consideration of the Carswell nomination. We are benefitting because every day that passes heightens the disgust of the American people with this cynical political triffling with the stature of our Supreme Court. With every day that passes more people are realizing what it will mean if this unknowledgeable man is confirmed to sit on the Court. And with every day that passes more people are letting their Senators know the revulsion they feel about this nomination.

I urge the Senate to reject Judge Carswell's nomination. We have no need of unknowledgeable men on the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I include pertinent newsclippings at this point:

[From the Washington (D.C.) Post, Mar. 24, 1970]

JUDGE CARSWELL: A LOOK AT THE REVERSAL RECORD

There has been a lot of talk in the Senate in recent days about Judge Carswell's 11 years of service as a federal trial judge and how well that fits him or does not fit him for service on the Supreme Court. Those opposed to his confirmation point to the rate at which his decisions have been reversed as a demonstration that he is, at best, a run-of-the-mill judge. Those who support confirmation claim that the reversal rate presents a "distorted and unreal" picture. "Like so many of the charges against him (this one) dissolves when exposed to the light of day," Senator Gurney said the other day, claiming that the judge has been reversed in only 33 out of the more than 2,000 civil cases he has handled and in only eight out of more than 2,500 criminal cases.

These figures are totally irrelevant, not to say blatant distortions.

The numbers of 2,000 and 2,500 represent all the cases filed in Judge Carswell's court and only about 15 per cent of these ever went to trial. What matters is what the Court of Appeals thought of the far smaller number of decisions it actually had an opportunity to review. There are fewer than 200 of these, according to the reports of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, but no one has produced a list of all of them. Compiling such a list is difficult since the cases are spread over tons of volumes of law books. But we have looked at all those we could find in the reports of the Fifth Circuit since July 1, 1964 and report the following concerning the record of the last half of his trial judge experience:

In criminal cases, Judge Carswell was upheld in 21 of 25 decisions, an affirmance rate of 84 per cent. All the other judges in his circuit were upheld 81 per cent of the time during the last five fiscal years.

In civil cases, Judge Carswell was upheld in 18 of 53 cases, an affirmance rate of 34 per cent. All the other trial judges in his circuit were upheld 72 per cent of the time.

In habeas corpus and similar cases, included in the civil category above because the courts list them that way, Judge Carswell was upheld in 5 out of 15 decisions, an affirmance rate of 33 per cent. All the other judges in Florida were upheld in 67 per cent of these cases during this period.

In the other civil cases—the disputes over contracts, accidents, and so on that are the bread and butter of the federal courts—Judge Carswell was upheld in 13 of 39 cases, a rate of 33 per cent. The other judges in the South having a batting average in such cases of about 75 per cent.

The key that may explain this record seems to lie in the reputation Judge Carswell has among some lawyers of not want'ng to try cases. Each habeas corpus reversal came because he denied a petition without a hearing. More than half of all the other reversals in civil cases came because he granted pretrial motions to dismiss, or for summary judgment, in situations which the Court of Appeals said required trials. It seems remarkable, for instance, that he was reversed several times over several years in negligence cases involving such things as auto accidents, a swimming pool accident, and a boat collision. These are cases in which the facts almost always determine the outcome and the law is clear that disputed facts cannot be resolved in summary judgments.

Judge Carswell's inclination to dispose of cases summarily does help clear court dockets when he is right. But it also helps clog them when he is wrong. And it seems that those who believe a jury ought to decide the facts must pay the costs of an appeal to win a reversal and a trial. The desire of a judge to be bold and to dispose of cases without trial might be understandable if he presided over an extremely busy docket. However, the caseload in Judge Carswell's court was regularly below the average per judge in his circuit and after 1962 was the lowest per judge in that circuit.

This record is not what could be called a good one. It is not, we suspect, even mediocre, as Senator Hruska would say. Nor can it be explained away, as some of the judge's supporters would have us believe, by arguments about the cases that were not appealed, about laws or court interpretations that had been changed in midstream, or about partial reversals. Among the 35 reversals in civil cases, three were partial, and no more than half a dozen came because of intervening court decisions and new issues of law. The others were decisions by the Court of Appeals that Judge Carswell was simply wrong—wrong 12 times because he ruled without hearing the facts. What all this means, it seems to us, is that the claim that Judge Carswell has been "an outstanding federal judge," to use Senator Gurney's words, evaporates when it is exposed to careful scrutiny.

THE AMERICAN BAR: A FAILURE OF RESPONSIBILITY

(By Anthony Lewis)

LONDON.—Some of us have an instinctive respect for the legal profession. We believe with Holmes that "the practice of law, in spite of popular jests, tends to make good citizens and good men." But the performance of the organized bar of the United States is making it hard to sustain that view.

The constitutional rights and legal traditions that protect Americans from arbitrary treatment by authority are under intense attack these days. Lawyers, of all people, might be expected to understand and speak out. But with some honorable exceptions, the voice of the bar is unheard.

RIGHTS UNDER ATTACK

For example, it has long been a fundamental assumption that the police may not invade a man's house or his person without some notice and some showing of cause. Now, in the name of fighting crime, legislation is being pushed to let policemen break into homes, and take blood or fingerprints or other physical evidence from suspects without their consent.

The Nixon Administration has sought, and the House has passed, legislation authorizing the "preventive detention" of men accused but not convicted of crime. There may be good arguments for the idea. But at the least it faces weighty objections in a constitutional system based on the assumption of trial first, sentence after.

The American Bar Association might have discussed some of the pressing issues of official power and individual freedom at its meeting last month in Atlanta. Instead, the delegates debated genocide—and managed to find dangers in the notion of a stand against mass murder. A small majority opposed the Administration's request that the United States join every other major country in ratifying the 1949 treaty on genocide.

Twenty years ago Philip L. Graham, late publisher of The Washington Post and a lawyer himself, told a group of lawyers that their profession had "substantially failed to meet its proper obligation of supporting individual freedom." It had silently acquiesced, he said, in restrictions that not long before "would have raised the collective hairs of this association straight on end."

Mr. Graham happened to be speaking to one legal group that did and does take a serious view of its public duty: The Association of the Bar of the City of New York. But for most of the profession his judgment is even more painfully true now than when he spoke.

THE BAR'S RESPONSIBILITY

The bar surely should feel a special responsibility toward the Supreme Court of the United States. In Britain it would be unthinkable for the profession to stay silent in the face of a political assault on the judicial process, yet that is what in fact is now happening in the United States.

Worse yet, the American Bar Association is playing a supporting role in what must be taken as a calculated effort to demean the Supreme Court. That is the nomination of Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the Court.

The A.B.A.'s Committee on the Federal Judiciary has found Judge Carswell "qualified." This of a nominee whose supporters have been unable to find a single opinion, a speech, a professional activity to which they can point as evidence of the slightest legal distinction. While Judge Carswell sat on the Federal District Court, his decisions taken to appeal were reversed 59 percent of the time. If he was "qualified" to sit on the Supreme Court, it would be simpler for the A.B.A. committee to do its work by keeping current a list of lawyers who would be "unqualified"—possibly about five.

The irony is that the president of the A.B.A., Bernard G. Segal, must know as well as anyone what an insult to the Court and to the American legal profession the nomination of Judge Carswell is. Mr. Segal is an enlightened man who was for years dedicated chairman of the A.B.A. Judiciary Committee. One understands the restraints upon him but still wishes he would speak out.

In failing to fulfill its public function the organized bar is surely inflicting wounds upon itself. Bright young people already question the outlook of the legal profession; the big firms are having a very difficult time attracting the best law graduates. If lawyers want to retain their traditional place of honor and influence in American life, they will have to remember, and live by, those other words of Justice Holmes: "The law is the witness and external deposit of our moral life. Its history is the history of the moral development of the race."

[From the New York Times, Mar. 23, 1970]

RATING JUDGE CARSWELL

The Senate, in its desultory debate over whether to confirm the nomination of Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court, is giving an uninspiring demonstration of its sense of responsibility on an issue of grave national concern.

President Nixon, in his weekend press conference, urged Senators to weigh, not the mail, but the evidence. It is precisely on the evidence that Judge Carswell emerges with a mediocre judicial record and with questionable attitudes toward social justice.

Senator Roman L. Hruska, Republican of Nebraska, in apparent contempt for excellence in American institutions, championed the right of all who are mediocre to be represented by mediocrity on the Supreme Court. Application of this view to the Senate is bad enough; to extend it to the highest court is intolerable. Yet, this appears to be the intent of those who deliberately spurn all honest assessment of evidence unfavorable to Judge Carswell.

For example, it has now become known that Elbert F. Tuttle, the retired Chief Judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in the South, who originally backed the nomination, subsequently decided to withdraw his endorsement. But Judge Carswell's supporters let the impression of Judge Tuttle's approval be used as continuing support for him.

A group of distinguished lawyers, including Francis T. P. Plimpton, president of the New York Bar Association, as well as the deans of leading law schools, have charged that the "qualified" rating, given Judge Carswell by the Federal Judiciary Committee of the American Bar Association, is seriously misleading. They consider the issue sufficiently grave to demand that the committee reopen the case and provide a more explicit rating, as it does in the case of other Federal judges.

Judge Carswell's supporters have used the A.B.A. rating as a judgment of high merit, when it is little more than an evasive rubber stamp. Attorney General Mitchell, who undoubtedly knows the real meaning of the A.B.A.'s faint praise, has stated publicly that his nominee comes "highly recommended" by the association.

These misleading tactics amply justify the demand for a more enlightening reappraisal An explicit rating would do much to help the Senators when they ultimately cast their vote on the dictates of both fact and conscience. The legal profession surely has a responsibility to offer credible guidance and, at the very least, make sure that its testimony cannot be abused in ways that might demean the Supreme Court.

SGT. HARRY CHINN OF HPD—A NEW KIND OF COP

HON. SPARK M. MATSUNAGA

OF HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. Speaker, the undue emphasis in recent times of depicting in news media scenes of alleged police brutality has left many Americans with an erroneous impression of the work of law-enforcement officers.

Too little attention has been focused on the many responsible and dedicated policemen who are quietly working in communities throughout the Nation in efforts to strengthen the forces of justice, law, and order.

One such policeman is Sgt. Harry Chinn of the Honolulu Police Department. For some time now Sergeant Chinn has been teaching an experimental "law and justice awareness" class at the Waianae Intermediate School, on the leeward side of the island of Oahu, and the response from the students has been highly enthusiastic.

Sergeant Chinn is now in the second of three semester-long classes at Waianae, and Honolulu Advertiser staff writer John Bilby recently wrote an excellent feature article for his paper on this "teaching experiment that works."

The article sets forth the specific objectives in Sergeant Chinn's lesson plan as follows:

(To) develop awareness of the extent to which law violations affect the community, develop a positive attitude toward upholding law and order, explain the process of establishing laws, explain why there are laws in a democratic society, and instill faith and confidence in the administration of justice.

Sergeant Chinn utilizes other innovative techniques in his classes, such as dramatic skits and musical plays, to which the young people can meaningfully relate in their daily lives.

Written essays on "Why We Should Get Involved" are required, and the students also participate in debates on apathy as they make an indepth study of their roles and responsibilities to the community.

I know that my colleagues would wish to join with me in commending Sgt. Harry Chinn on his remarkable achievements. Today's students at Waianae will, no doubt, be better citizens tomorrow because of his dedicated efforts.

I commend this refreshing story on the work of a police officer to my colleagues. I am sure that it will be an inspiration to many as we seek to restore confidence and respect in our peace officers and to find effective ways to combat the wave of lawlessness in our Nation.

The article, "Policeman Harry Chinn Makes Sense to Kids," from the March 17, 1970, issue of the Honolulu Advertiser, follows for the RECORD:

A TEACHING EXPERIMENT THAT WORKS—POLICEMAN HARRY CHINN MAKES SENSE TO KIDS

(By John Bilby)

Some of the kids call Harry Chinn a beautiful cat.

He wears a blue uniform, and a badge, and even a gun on his hip, and sergeant's stripes, and shined black shoes and a friendly smile, really gentle as well as firm.

He has been doing a job that must raise many questions, and doing it in such a way that he seems to be getting lots of earned credit. Chinn has been pushing law and order with the kids at Waianae Intermediate School.

A city policeman, he has been teaching a Law and Justice Awareness class.

It's an experimental class. This is why I say it must raise questions. Our country is founded on many principals which oppose our becoming a police state, and many other principals which oppose anarchy and disregard of the laws.

Most observers agree that there is an understanding gap between police and young people today. There are many differing opinions about why, including, even, the opinion that law enforcement in the U.S. has made the problem worse.

Chinn seems to be the sort of policeman-teacher who recognizes his own responsibilities in trying to teach responsibility to intermediate school children.

Chinn is the sort of policeman-teacher who is not afraid or ashamed to say that love is where it's at, which puts him many jumps closer to communicating with young people than most good and brave men who wear the badge.

The second of three semester-long classes in law abiding have been taught by the sergeant now. He has to commute from the city to the country daily for the job.

Chinn's mimeographed lesson plan sets forth such specific objectives as: "develop awareness of the extent to which law violations affect the community," "develop a positive attitude toward upholding law and order," "explain the process of establishing laws," "explain why there are laws in a democratic society," and "instill faith and confidence in the administration of justice."

In early sessions, students report on their own experiences with losses through theft and as victims of crimes. They are advised on safeguards against burglary.

They are taught to recognize concepts like "character assassination," and how false statements can harm others unjustly, much as labels (for instance, the lesson plan mentions "fuzz") can limit one's thinking.

Family and community responsibilities are disdevoted to studying the kind of apathy which allows citizens to stand by without helping or doing anything when others are being attacked in their presence.

The students write an essay, "Why We Should Get Involved." They have debates on apathy. The role of the police officer is examined.

Students are divided into groups and act out situations, such as giving and receiving traffic citations, dealing with and being dealt with as boisterous, or intoxicated or lawbreaking persons.

When, for instance, the student has to figure out how to deal, in his role as policeman, with a boisterous group, he gets a new perspective on that kind of happening. "They feel what it's like to be a policeman," the teacher said.

Sgt. Chinn gets into how laws are made, reviews different social systems—communism, socialism, fascism, anarchy.

Other law officers visit the class and lecture. "Every one has walked out with a completely different picture of the younger generation," Chinn said.

The class makes a field trip to the Capitol and various courts. There is class time devoted to airing personal criticisms of laws that exist. The sergeant says the students are outspoken.

"At times they've come up with some very constructive possible revisions of laws," he said. "And I had kids who wouldn't stand up in class and say anything who now can go up on the stage before an audience."

Chinn was outlining all of this shortly after the standing ovation that he and three dozen of his Law and Justice Awareness class had received after putting on an evening assembly program and skit before an audience of 300 at Waianae Intermediate School.

They called it a skit, but it was really a play, "Who's Guilty?"

A disturbance is created in a nightclub by Miss Jones, played admirably by Charlotte Kaopua. An officer arrives. "Well, well, here comes the fuzz," says Miss Jones, bringing down the house. "Hi! You're kinda cute," she tells the hapless officer, Calvin Corpuz, before decking him in one of the most convincing fight scenes ever staged.

She is finally subdued, then handcuffed. A crowd gathers. "Hey! What are you doing to her?" someone in the crowd demands.

The officer is eventually brought to trial on charges of police brutality. At first, during the trial no witnesses will come forth to testify in his behalf. Finally, out of conscience, one couple comes before the judge, Raymond Meyers, and clears the officer's name.

The program began with introduction of police officers and other VIPs, and remarks by Raymond Miyasato, principal of Nanakuli High, and Police Captain George Kisni.

In the play, students played roles ranging from streetwalkers and "old maids" to lawyers and hula, Tahitian, Samoan and Maori dancers.

Officer Joe Kamai assisted Chinn in getting the production together. Chinn played guitar and composed the final song sung by the cast. I asked him for the lyrics.

"You look like a hip guy," he said to me. Somehow I expected that with the badge riding there on his chest, my long hair and bell-bottoms were going to result in his talking down to me. On the contrary, he meant that he thought I would understand the art of his poetry.

"When you're on a ferris wheel, everything seems so different and beautiful," he said. I couldn't tell when he was just rapping and when he was reciting the lyrics.

"When you're on the top and look down, watching the crowds below, people laughing, children shouting. This is the way the world should go.

"Round and round on the ferris wheel, everything's aglow. Hand in hand they seem to stand. This is the way the world should go. Why can't this world always be like today, people sharing their dreams along the way.

"No cares or sorrows, no hate and no fears.

"Sounds of love ringing in our ears.

"Up above on the ferris wheel, round and round we go. Feeling fine, love's on our mind. This is the way the world should go."

About half of the play's cast had gathered around Sgt. Chinn as I interviewed him, including a couple of girls who had cried on stage when he announced that this was to be their last dramatic performance together.

"Did some of them start out with hostility toward you?" I asked.

"Definitely," he said.

"Are there a few that still feel that way?"

Chinn reflected and finally said, "What do you think, Ray?" to the boy who had played the judge.

"Everybody likes him," Ray told me.

"I am amazed at times at the potential warmth and love," Chinn said. "At times I scold them. I'm not afraid to bring out their faults directly, but when they leave, there are no hard feelings. There's love.

"These are the most beautiful kids I've ever worked with," he said. "You can quote me on that, please!"

"You're a beautiful cop, man," I said. The circle of kids around us nodded in thoughtful agreement."

RECESSION, PLEASE GO AWAY

HON. JOE L. EVINS

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. EVINS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, Columnist David Lawrence, editor of U.S. News & World Report, writes in the current issue of the magazine of signs pointing to a recession.

As evidences of this downturn in the economy he cites increasing unemployment, high interest rates, and inflation, among other factors.

Because of the interest of my colleagues and the American people in this most important subject I place the Lawrence column in the RECORD herewith.

The column follows:

RECESSION, PLEASE GO AWAY!

(By David Lawrence)

"Recession" is an unpleasant word No Administration likes to concede that an existing economic condition is a recession. But as unemployment begins to rise, as profits start to fall, as interest rates soar, as mortgage rates reach unprecedented heights, and as the cost of living is at record levels, these economic facts cannot merely be dubbed "inflation."

When the President of the United States, moreover, orders $1.5 billion of government funds—which he previously had withdrawn from building programs—to be reallocated now to aid the construction industry, it means that the national economy is feeling some of the pangs of a recession.

The President appeals to labor and management to hold down wages and prices, but says not a word about any controls to be imposed by the Government.

The business and financial community has been given hope that interest rates will soon be lowered, and that this particularly will make money available for more activity in new housing. Nobody in the Administration, however, is predicting specifically just when the high interest rates will come down.

Paul W. McCracken, Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, in a press conference on March 17, said that he does not believe the country is running into a recession. But it all depends upon whether a serious recession is meant or one that is slight, yet painful just the same. Mr. McCracken realizes that price levels are not easily changed. He commented thus:

"The price level objective is not, of course, a lower price level. The price level objective is to achieve a new stability of the price level. It might have been better if we had never gotten this far, but we are here and consequently it cannot be the objective of policy to try to drive back down the general price level. All we want is a new stability. That is not inconsistent with the fact that specific prices, of course, may go down and there will always be the inevitable churning around."

Another way of saying this, to be sure, is that, when the Vietnam war began, the Government might well have insisted upon applying wage and price controls. The price level could thereby have been maintained at a lower stage. It certainly is going to be difficult to attain stability at a high price level when many wage and price adjustments remain to be made.

Arthur Burns, Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, has been hinting that the tight money policy will have to be relaxed in order to prepare the way for a decline in interest rates. He told the Senate Banking and Currency Committee a few days ago:

"The downward interest rate adjustments that have taken place reflect primarily a recognition by market participants that the economy is slowing, that inflation expectations are beginning to be replaced by more sober judgments about the outlook for prices, and that some easing in monetary policy might soon take place."

Mr. Burns added that a number of important economic indicators have been pointing downward recently, "thereby giving rise to concern that the corrective measures taken by the Government may go too far and perhaps lead to a business recession." He also declared:

"It is still our view (on the Federal Reserve Board) that the current economic adjustment lacks the pervasive and cumulative characteristics of a recession and that, in any event, the economy will resume its upward course later this year."

It is apparent, however, that uncertainty prevails even in Government circles, and that experimentalism rather than a reliance on past experience in dealing with wages and prices has been the reason why the nation has been drifting into a recession.

Evidently there will be no effort to impose wage and price controls because the political consequences are feared. So the prospects are that the Administration will try a new method—to manage what it considers a slowdown by allowing just a little more inflation. This is a risky way to handle an economy which has a gross national product of more than $950 billion.

Meanwhile, big strikes are possible for the year 1970. These will have a far-reaching effect even on unrelated industries. For wage scales have a way of being paralleled by workers in different kinds of businesses. Management, on the other hand, has no choice. Either it gives in to labor's demands or undergoes strikes.

Heretofore Congress has enacted laws authorizing wage and price controls whenever the United States has been engaged in any war involving the expenditure of large sums.

The real question now is whether the ill effects of a disrupted economy can be cured by the Government itself and how much of a recession is going to be necessary in order to achieve some form of stability in wages and prices and to bring about the lowering of interest rates to workable levels.

Officials hope that their corrective measures will stop the slowdown in business and that the economy soon will adjust itself. So, in effect, the soft-spoken plea of Government today is: "Recession, please go away!"

A SALUTE TO CAPT. ROBERT M. WILBUR, JR., WHOSE COURAGE AND CALM BROUGHT 70 PEOPLE TO A SAFE LANDING

HON. WILLIAM B. WIDNALL

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. WIDNALL. Mr. Speaker, 1 week ago, Capt. Robert M. Wilbur, Jr., of Fair Lawn, N.J., performed an act of skill and courage for which he has been praised throughout the world. I join with other residents of New Jersey's Seventh District in saluting our neighbor.

His extraordinary performance reflects the quality of his training and the capability of airline pilots throughout America who carry us across millions of accident-free miles each year. But, the most significant note of Captain Wilbur's achievement is his own self-control and determination in bringing 70 people safely to earth.

The following story from Newsweek magazine unravels the facts to date of his heroic act:

HIJACKING: MURDER IN THE SKY

It was the most routine of flights—the Eastern Airlines 7:30 p.m. shuttle from Newark, N.J., to Boston—and Sandy Saltzer and Christine Peterson, two pretty stewardesses, were collecting fares while the DC–9 made its descent to Logan International Airport. When the girls approached a slender young man sitting all alone in the next to last row of seats, he handed Miss Saltzer $18—$3 shy of the full fare. She asked for more, and the passenger reached into a black valise only to pull out not the expected dollar bills but a .38-caliber revolver. "I want to see the captain," he said.

Coolly, Miss Saltzer asked the gunman to put the weapon inside his shirt so as not to disturb the other 65 passengers. After he complied, she led him to the rear-cabin intercom. "I'm busy," retorted Capt. Robert M. Wilbur Jr., on being informed of the gunman's request; but when the stewardess mentioned the gun, co-pilot James E. Hartley stuck his head out of the cockpit and asked what the trouble was. Into the cockpit went Miss Saltzer and the gunman. Out came the stewardess, doing her best to look unruffled. Minutes later, shots were heard.

Tableau: "They sounded like a cap gun," Miss Peterson said later, but the gunfire was real. By now some passengers knew trouble was afoot. The jet made an abrupt but smooth landing at Logan airport, and the cockpit held a grisly tableau: co-pilot Hartley was slumped unconscious in his chair, the gunman lay wounded on the floor, and Captain Wilbur sat wearily at the controls, both arms bleeding heavily from gunshot wounds.

At Massachusetts General Hospital, resuscitation efforts failed to revive the 30-year-old Hartley, but the assailant and Captain Wilbur were soon pronounced out of danger. As investigators probed the affair, the following picture of what had actualy gone on in the cockpit emerged. Unlike other recent U.S. aerial hijackers, the intruder did not want to go to Cuba. "I don't really have any place to go—just fly till the plane runs out of gas," he ordered Wilbur. But then the aircraft went into a turn, and the gunman started shooting. Hartley jumped up, and though mortally wounded, succeeded in grabbing the gun and shooting the attacker. In the next few minutes, Wilbur, 35, not only subdued the still active gunman, but radioed for emergency landing clearance, an ambulance, a doctor and the police, and even remembered to flick on the "No Smoking" sign.

The armed passenger turned out to be a 27-year-old unemployed bachelor named John J. DiVivo, who lived with his widowed mother in West New York, N.J. At the weekend, about the only light police could shed on the episode was the fact that DiVivo had tried to commit suicide twelve years ago by shooting himself in the head. The bullet lodged in his brain and, according to his mother, it was never removed.

VISITING NURSE ASSOCIATION AND MEDICARE

HON. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, JR.

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. O'NEILL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, on February 25, the Visiting Nurse Association of Boston held its annual meeting and announced the serious and often tragic results of a reinterpretation of medicare regulations. This new interpretation and a utilization review procedure have resulted in a major decrease in medicare payments for service to the elderly.

I have called this a tragic situation because the Visiting Nurse Association estimates that between 20 to 30 percent of elderly patients who presently are served by the VNA will no longer have their expenses paid by medicare.

Most elderly people are on fixed incomes and are the most severely hurt but the massive inflation presently plaguing our economy. Medicare has meant to many of them the difference between life and death and the difference between adequate medical care and no medical assistance at all. The Visiting Nurse Association intends to continue to serve these people, but it cannot afford to continue at the present rate on its limited budget. Patients themselves or their families will have to provide some reimbursement. The welfare department of the Commonwealth will have to provide the rest.

I am enclosing a press release from the Visiting Nurse Association of Boston for the benefit of my colleagues. I ask that particular attention be directed to the three examples of the people who will not be covered by Medicare under the new ruling. All of these people definitely need the service of the VNA, and it seems to me to be absolutely arbitrary and unreasonable to exclude them from the coverage.

I have contacted the Director of the Social Security Administration protesting this action, and have included a copy of my letter. I urge my colleagues to do likewise.

The statement and letter follows:

[Press release of Visiting Nurse Association of Boston, Feb. 26, 1970]

MAJOR CUTS BEING MADE IN MEDICARE COVERAGE, FOR PATIENTS NEEDING VISITING NURSE SERVICES

The Visiting Nurse Association of Boston announced at its annual meeting on Wednesday that a reinterpretation of Medicare regulations and a new utilization review procedure by the fiscal intermediary (Massachusetts Blue Cross Association) have resulted in a major cut back in Medicare payment for service. An estimated 20–30% of elderly patients presently served by the V.N.A. under the program will no longer have their expenses paid by this federal government health insurance program.

The current interpretation of the rules means that only patients whose condition will definitely improve or who are in the terminal stage of an illness are eligible for Medicare services from the V.N.A. (home health agency). These patients also must be homebound, have a definite functional limitation, and require skilled nursing, physical therapy or speech therapy services on an intermittent basis to be eligible.

What will happen to the one hundred or more patients no longer eligible for their service to be covered by Medicare? Although the V.N.A. of Boston will continue to provide care, patients who can pay all or part of the cost will be billed for the service rendered. Patients who cannot afford to pay should apply to the Welfare Department for Medicaid which will reimburse the V.N.A. at partial cost for services not covered by Medicare. The V.N.A. is presently attempting to estimate the financial impact of this new development on its budget. During this period the Agency's endowment fund is being used to finance the care not covered by other payment plans. The V.N.A. will receive $242,-500. United Fund Money through U.C.S. in 1970, but this is already budgeted to pay for services to other patients not eligible for either Medicare of Medicaid and unable to pay for their care. If additional funds cannot be obtained, the V.N.A. will be forced to curtail its services.

We strongly urge either a change at the federal level in the interpretation of "skilled nursing" on an "intermittent" basis which the law specifies as required for covered home health services, or new legislation to encompass the types of home health services urgently needed by the elderly. The V.N.A. of Boston will communicate its concern to the Social Security Administration which administers the Medicare Program and do everything it can through the National League for Nursing and other channels to bring about the necessary changes so that elderly patients can be cared for in their own homes with the comfort and dignity to which they are entitled.

The following are examples of patients whose V.N.A. service will no longer be covered by Medicare:

1. The elderly cardiac patient with a pacemaker implanted to regulate his heart beat and for whom the doctor has requested professional nursing assessment weekly to detect any beginning malfunctioning of the pacemaker which would require prompt hospitalization, does not meet the criteria for covered service.

2. The patient with pernicious anemia who requires an intramuscular injection of Vitamin B12 monthly indefinitely to maintain a satisfactory blood count does not meet the criterion for "intermittent" service and the V.N.A. claim for payment is rejected.

3. The blind diabetic who has been taught to give himself insulin with a special tru-set syringe but requires weekly checking of the syringe to see that it is set for the correct dosage, and weekly assessment of the patient's general condition including foot care and skin care so crucial for a blind diabetic patient if he is to remain in his own home alone no longer meets the criterion of a need for skilled nursing as the services "could have been adequately and safely self administered or performed by the average nonmedical person."

The major health needs of the majority of elderly people living in their own homes who are homebound because of one or more chronic illnesses are on-going, assistance with personal care; supervision of a special medical regime including diet, medications, and physical activity; professional nursing assessment of patient's condition and reaction to the medical regimes; emotional support of patient and family faced with chronic illness; and periodic reporting to patient's physician. This service is provided by the V.N.A. of Boston through its nursing and home health aide staff, and frequently is the service which keeps patients from developing complications which would require more extensive medical and other professional skilled care. This service also makes it possible for patients with chronic illnesses to live and die in their own homes rather than in more costly and depersonalized nursing homes and hospitals. Actually only a small percent of the elderly patients require the type of skilled services currently recognized by Medicare as "covered services" from home health agencies (V.N.A.'s).

Patients and their families cannot accept the fact that the Medicare Insurance will not pay for needed service. From all the literature and publicity, they were given to understand that Medicare was the answer to their health care needs and that they are entitled to 100 home health visits a year. They are very upset by this recent interpretation of more limited service.

ALICE M. DEMPSEY,
General Director.
Mrs. PHILIP EISEMAN,
President.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., March 25, 1970.

ROBERT M. BALL,
Commissioner, Social Security Administration, Washington, D.C.

DEAR COMMISSIONER BALL: Enclosed is a press release from the Visiting Nurse Association of Boston with regard to the effects of a re-interpretation of Medicare regulations. An estimated 20–30% of elderly patients presently served by the V.N.A. under the Medicare Program will no longer have their expenses paid for visiting nurse service.

I believe this is absolutely unfair and contrary to the intent of the program and in contradiction to hopes fostered by the previous rulings under Medicare.

I would greatly appreciate knowing what you intend to do about this, and when these people might again be brought under Medicare coverage.

With every good wish,

Sincerely,

THOMAS P. O'NEILL,
Member of Congress.

ENVIRONMENTAL NEWSLETTER

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, here is the text of a recent newsletter I am sending out to many Californians:

ENVIRONMENTAL NEWSLETTER

CONCERNED CALIFORNIANS WANT STRONGER GOVERNMENT ACTION ON ENVIRONMENTAL QUALITY

Over a half-million Californians responded to my recent questionnaire on a broad range of environmental issues, and the overall indication is that tougher, more positive government action should be forthcoming.

In addition to over 500-thousand questionnaire replies, my offices have been flooded with detailed letters from citizens with suggestions and comments on various environmental problems. Many of the recommendations are quite valuable, and could lead to new legislative and administrative proposals.

Already, the overwhelming show of support for strong government direction and action has influenced my legislative program. I have been drafting and introducing almost a dozen new proposals to augment what I already consider the strongest package of environmental legislation before the Congress, and next month's newsletter will go into greater detail about these new measures—all of which reflect the questionnaire results.

While we have not added up the individual tallies on question 8 which asked for a listing of national priorities for 1970, the top two issues by far were Vietnam and pollution. Here now is the final statewide breakdown of answers on the questions:

Do you favor proposals to ban the internal combustion gasoline engine unless it meets stringent exhaust emission standards?

Yes; 80 percent.

No: 20 percent.

Do you feel the oil companies and automobile manufacturers should be required to act more quickly to solve the problems of air pollution?

Yes: 96 percent.

No: 4 percent.

Do you favor a Federal Regulatory Commission on Environmental Quality?

Yes: 77 percent.

No: 23 percent.

Do you favor stronger government efforts to regulate shoreline use in order to substantially increase the amount of beach property available for public use?

Yes: 83 percent.

No: 17 percent.

Would you support stronger government efforts to regulate use of undeveloped open spaces, including advance acquisition of land for public use?

Yes: 82 percent.

No: 18 percent.

Would you support a complete ban on all federal offshore oil drilling except in national emergency?

Yes: 77 percent.

No: 23 percent.

Do you favor much stronger governmental efforts to educate the public as to the problems of over population?

Yes: 87 percent.

No: 13 percent.

SCIENCE COMMITTEE HOLDS ENVIRONMENTAL HEARINGS

Questionnaire results aided recent hearings conducted in Los Angeles and San Francisco by the Science, Research and Development subcommittee of the House Science and Astronautics Committee.

I acted as hearing chairman in the two days in San Francisco, and during the four days we heard from over 50 witnesses who gave their views on the topic, "Technology Assessment and Environmental Problems."

Certainly it became amply evident in the hearings that we need to develop an "ecological point of view" as well as new institutions to enable us to see more clearly the full range of factors involved in environmental planning.

The hearings also highlighted what appears to be increasing skepticism with the traditional and conventional beliefs that progress and economic growth are, in themselves per se, good. As Dr. John Dyckman of Berkeley noted at our hearings in San Francisco:

"For over a generation we have pointed to our National Income and Gross National Product as proud measures of our accomplishment. Now we may face the necessity of revaluation of that output, perhaps by subtracting the costs of environmental cleanup from our output, and the massive transfer payments to the poor from our income."

It is clear that if we in California—and in this nation—are to achieve the kind of life to which we aspire, we may have to make some fundamental changes in our own life styles; in our views toward resource utilization, the application of our technologies, and the increasing growth of our population.

As one witness noted, the probability of some particular environmental catastrophe occurring is "proportional to the power of our technology, to the number of people on whose benefit that technology is exercised, and to the haste with which that technology is applied to ill-considered goals."

Dr. Willard Libby, the Nobel Prize-winning Chairman of the Department of Chemistry at UCLA, called for the development of new career category, that of Environmental Doctor. Dr. Libby testified that this new professional would be analogous to the Medical Doctor (M.D.) His patient would be the natural and human environment. Dr. Libby, in cooperation with Drs. A. J. Haagen-Smit and Chauncey Starr of UCLA, is presently developing an interdisciplinary curriculum for this new professional area. Final decision on the future of this concept as a formal degree will have to be made by the UCLA Administration and the State Board of Regents.

Dr. John Rodman, Professor of Political Studies at Pitzer College, had some cautionary words about the involvement of youth in environmental problems and the trends toward Pop Ecology:

"Pop Ecology is the religion of a coming generation of voters, and I think this will fundamentally change the nature of the political ballgame. It is terribly important that people in positions of authority in science, industry, and government not simply take offense at the Luddite mood—its symbolic destruction of machines, its "return to nature," etc.—but that they respond sympathetically and imaginatively to the concerns that animate it and to the legitimate questions it poses . . ."

Many witnesses at our hearings, such as Dr. Philip Lee, Chancellor of the University of California at San Francisco, called for large scale Federal reorganization to meet present and future environmental crises. As Dr. Lee noted:

"I would suggest that a further step must be taken in the Executive Branch in relation to programs affecting the environment. I believe a single agency should be established, either along the lines of the Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) or the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) to administer federal programs related to the quality of the environment."

I believe that it is imperative for the Congress to equip itself to assess technological developments, predict the probable consequences, and act to protect the American people against adverse results while assuring the nation of all possible benefits. To this end, our Subcommittee on Science, Research and Development—after three years of study—introduced recently a bill to establish within the Congress an Office of Technology Assessment (OTA). I believe this bill is of major historical significance both to the Congress and American people.

WHAT YOU CAN DO

A Washington, D.C., television station devotes part of three weekly newscasts to pictorial reports of who local polluters are and what they are doing. Area residents get in touch with the station, and the station takes it from there.

I like that idea. It involves local citizens in the environmental crusade, and it vividly points out just who are the major offenders.

I have decided to ask that you, as members of the Action Committee on Environmental Quality, participate in a similar project. We can compile a list of the California polluters—both public and private—with your cooperation.

To do this, we will need a photograph of the offender and the pollution it is causing. It is imperative that we have pictures if we are to prove our cases. Send the photos, with a very brief description, to the Action Committee, Box 69, Los Angeles, 90028.

ITALIAN–NASA AGREEMENT SIGNED

HON. GEORGE P. MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to report to the House of Representatives that the Italian National Research Commission and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration have entered into an agreement for the launching of Italian scientific spacecraft.

This is not the first such agreement and it indicates the fine cooperation which exists between this country and Italy in developing the techniques of using outer space for the benefit of mankind.

Following is a news release of the event:

ITALIAN-NASA AGREEMENT SIGNED

In an agreement signed today, the Italian National Research Commission (CNR) and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration set forth conditions under which NASA will provide reimbursable launchings for Italian scientific spacecraft.

The first spacecraft expected to be launched under the agreement will be the Italian satellite SIRIO to be placed in a 22,000 mile stationary orbit by a Delta rocket in 1972. The satellite, which will be designed and made in Italy, will carry telecommunications, technology and scientific experiments which will be carried out with ground stations in Europe.

The agreement provides that separate launch contracts will be entered into for each launching requested by CNR and sets forth responsibilities of each party in connection with launchings.

CNR will provide the spacecraft and its experiments, will inform NASA of the spacecraft's design and mission, and will reimburse NASA for the launch vehicle and associated services.

NASA will furnish a rocket which will meet the mission requirements and will provide the launching, tracking and data acquisition and other services as needed.

The agreement was signed by Professor Giampietro Puppi of CNR and NASA Administrator Thomas O. Paine.

The present agreement is the second memorandum of understanding concerning reimbursable launchings entered into by NASA. The first was concluded with the European Space Research Organization Dec. 30, 1966.

149TH ANNIVERSARY OF GREEK INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 149th anniversary of the struggle for Greek independence. It is a fitting occasion to salute those of Greek origin here in America who are among our most valued citizens, and it is also fitting to extend our hand of friendship across the sea to those in Greece who have pledged themselves to deter the forces of any despots who would rob their nation of its liberty and national independence.

Greece gave birth to the principles of freedom and democracy. Our Founding Fathers adopted these concepts to frame our Constitution, and we have continued to thrive on the basic philosophies handed down to us by the ancient Greek.

Out of the show of 400 years of oppressive rule under the Ottoman Turks, the first blow for Greek independence was struck by a small band of patriots headed by Ypsilanti on March 25, 1821. This bloody struggle for national independence lasted 7 succeeding years over land and sea before the Greek people finally managed to extricate themselves from Turkish rule.

Since the time the Archbishop of Patras raised his standard of the cross over his monastic establishment in 1821, we, here in America, have followed the course of dramatic events in Greece with heartfelt sympathy and interest.

We truly admire the traditions and history of this land across the sea whose brave people formed the true cradle of Western civilization. In fact the whole Western World has adapted Grecian art, Grecian architecture, and the pathos and drama of the Greek theater. Grecian philosophy and arts run through the threads of American history, tightly interwoven and intermingled with the American way of life.

The Greek people are loved for their spirit and fire, and foremost for their courage. From the time of the ancient Greek gladiators to the patriots who fought in the hills after World War II, Greeks have strived for the principles of liberty and freedom that we cherish in America. In fact the very principles of a sense of independence and freedom were ideals first conceptualized, fought for and died for in Greece.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot begin to recount the many contributions Americans of Hellenic extraction have made to this Nation. The list, which begins with such great names as Mitropoulos in music, Papanicolau in medicine, Anagnostopoulos in education, Zachos in literature, and Vice President SPIRO T. AGNEW, runs on in a seemingly endless line.

To these great Americans, and to my brothers in the Order of the Ahepa, which I am proud to be a member of, and to all my friends of Hellenic extraction, I would like to extend my warmest best wishes on this day of celebration. I salute the 149th anniversary of Greek Independence Day.

FIFTY-FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF AMERICAN LEGION

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, the American Legion, longtime champion of the American servicemen, longtime supporter of numerous youth programs, longtime watchdog of this Nation's liberty and democracy, observed its 51st anniversary early this month.

Since its beginning on March 15, 1919, by members of the first American Expeditionary Force in Paris, France, the Legion has expanded, until today it spreads across the face of the Nation. It includes more than 16,500 individual posts with more than 3 million members.

The accomplishments by the Legion have been vast and far flung. It has proven to be far more than an organization where returning servicemen gather to swap war stories. It is an organization which has spent more than half a century impressing upon individual citizens their obligation to safeguard this Nation's belief in justice, freedom, and democracy; to protect all we hold as sacred.

The Legion has helped servicemen adjust to their return to civilian life but it has done far more than that alone. It has assured the veteran of the welfare of his widow and children. The GI bill not only enabled veterans to further their education, thus bringing a tremendous return in benefits to the Federal Government for the money spent, but it also insured the right of veterans to many rehabilitation and compensation programs. The Legion worked tirelessly to extend these benefits to those who served in the Korean war and the Vietnam conflict.

The Legion has always been in the forefront of the fight against the spread of communism on all levels. It has initiated programs to inform the public of the insidious means used by this political philosophy to undermine American principles.

The Legion has carried its belief in its motto, "For God and Country," into working with the youth of the Nation, guiding and instilling in them the ideals which have made America great.

It has spent approximately $200 million since 1925 to protect the welfare of veterans' children; it has sponsored more than 4,000 Boy Scout units; thousands upon thousands of youth have taken advantage of its athletic programs. The best example of the latter, I believe, is its American Legion baseball program but there are others.

Outside the realm of athletics, the Legion has taken an active role in other youth activities. It has programs such as the Boys State and Nation, the Girls State and Nation, the National High School Oratorical Contest, and various scholarship awards.

The Legion and its work, I feel certain, has exceeded the dreams of its founders and the occasion of its 51st anniversary should not pass without official recognition from a grateful Nation. I take great pleasure to extend congratulations to all Legionnaires in all posts. I wish them the greatest of success in their future endeavors.

CENSUS BUREAU ISSUES CHINESE AND SPANISH LANGUAGE 1970 QUESTIONNAIRE GUIDES

HON. CHARLES H. WILSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, as the Members know, one of the early and continuing concerns of the Subcommittee on Census and Statistics has been the adequacy of the procedures being developed by the Census Bureau to insure, in the 1970 census, a complete and accurate count of the population—particularly as regards our ethnic minorities, for, historically, these are the groups which have been most difficult to enumerate.

As chairman of the subcommittee, I have made an especial effort to keep the Congress informed of the Bureau's progress toward its goal of making the 1970 census the best ever enumerated. Recently, for example, I reported to the House that information about the census is being made available in 24 different languages to make certain that minority groups will be accurately enumerated.

Today, I wish to report on still another step taken by the Census Bureau to improve the census—a step which our subcommittee has long encouraged.

Special followup questionnaire guides, printed in Spanish and Chinese, will be made available to enumerators in applicable geographic areas, to be used when the householder indicates that he was unable to fill out the regular census questionnaire because of an insufficient understanding of the English language.

Since this is an important innovation in census methodology, and one in which the entire membership has a direct interest, I will be glad to make available to the Members copies of these questionnaire guides.

THE 52D ANNIVERSARY OF BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. ROMAN C. PUCINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, for centuries the peoples of Russia suffered under the heavy yoke of Russian tsarism.

The outbreak of World War I created unique opportunities for those non-Russian peoples residing along the borderlands between the Russian Empire and Europe proper. Russia's distress created political advantages for these peoples that otherwise would have been denied them. The Byelorussians, like the Ukranians, Lithuanians, and others within the empire, seized the opportunity to establish their own national independence.

The first all-Byelorussian Congress met in Minsk on December 5, 1917, and adopted a resolution by an overwhelming majority which endorsed the right of nations to self-determination and called for the establishment of a democratic government to be designated the Byelorussian National Republic—BNR.

Sensing the danger to their own revolutionary interests, the Bolsheviks, who had seized power in November, surrounded the place where the Congress was being held and with a display of armed power broke up the meeting. By this action, Byelorussia became one of the first victims of Communist aggression.

On March 25, 1918, the Byelorussian Government proclaimed its total independence and set to work expanding its activities in all fields of national life. It was granted recognition by many states, but this was to be short lived.

On December 10, 1918, the Red army seized Minsk and established a government of military revolutionary committees. Byelorussia's efforts to establish an anti-Bolshevik force failed, and with the Treaty of Riga in 1921, ending the war between Poland and Bolshevik Russia, Byelorussia was partially divided between her neighbors, and the remainder came under Soviet control.

We can take little satisfaction from the fact that Byelorussia gained reunification after World War II, since she is still a slave under the Soviet Communist Government, in reality an extension of the czarist system.

Nor can we take satisfaction from the fact that in the U.N. General Assembly, the U.S.S.R., Byelorussia, and the Ukraine each have a separate vote as free and independent nations. Neither Byelorussia nor the Ukraine is free or independent, but merely married in bondage to a totalitarian system permeating all of eastern Europe.

Today, we have 1 million people of Byelorussian origin living in the free world, primarily in the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom, and Australia. The fate of their countrymen and the fate of the other captive nations serve as testimony to remind us of those words spoken so accurately by J. Reuben Clark, Jr., former Ambassador to Mexico and Under Secretary of State, when he stated:

> Tyranny has never come to live with any people with a placard on his breast bearing his name. He always comes in deep disguise, sometimes proclaiming an endowment of freedom, sometimes promising help to the unfortunate and downtrodden, not by creating something for those who do not have, but by robbing those who have. But tyranny is always a wolf in sheep's clothing, and he always ends by devouring the whole flock, saving none.

Mr. Speaker, let us pay homage to the country of Byelorussia and her people on this day, their 52d anniversary of independence. Let us all hope and pray that one day soon, we can truly celebrate the independence and freedom of Byelorussia as we did briefly in 1918.

YOUNG STUDENT PROMOTES DRUG EDUCATION

HON. LAURENCE J. BURTON

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. BURTON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, in our concern over drug education, we sometimes forget that mature teenagers can communicate better than adults. The following story illustrates this fact, I believe it might be of interest:

[From the Deseret News, Mar. 19, 1970]

SUSAN, 13, IS BAD NEWS TO BAY'S DRUG PUSHERS

NEWARK, CALIF.—Susan Dusio, 13, is bad news to local drug pushers.

The 4-foot-7, 70-pound eighth grader at MacGregor Junior High School is almost entirely responsible for arranging a week of drug-abuse education that taught 640 teenagers what the drug scene is all about.

"The response was indescribable," says Vice Principal Kenneth Strange. "She had help, of course, but Susan carried the ball from the very beginning and virtually handled the thing by herself. It wouldn't have happened without her."

The fact that Susan knew some teen-agers on drugs led her to choose that topic for a special report in history class.

"A lot of kids smoke, but cigarettes are not as bad as drugs. A lot of kids picked air pollution, but that's not as bad as drugs, so I picked drugs because it's the worst problem."

She sent for some literature and learned that speakers, exhibits and movies were available. Her teachers responded enthusiastically to her suggestion for a week of programs.

"It's important that kids get the right information on drugs, not lies and exaggerations," says Susan, who politely refuses whenever she is offered drugs, usually out of school.

She got on the telephone—to the state Narcotics Bureau in San Francisco, Alameda County authorities, the private Synanon House in Oakland, and to Headway, another volunteer group in Oakland working to stop the spread of drug abuse.

Susan lined up a list of speakers, exhibits, and movies, and a week in March was set aside by the school for the show. Local service clubs and banks chipped in $150 to help with expenses.

At the conclusion of the week of discussions, she was pleased with the results.

"A lot of kids seem to know more now about what it means to take drugs," Susan says. "I think some of them have a different point of view about it now. I hope so."

PLYMOUTH, MICH., YOUTHS PRODUCE BILLS IN SIMULATED SESSION

HON. MARVIN L. ESCH

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, all too often the youth of America are judged by the headlines which a few destructive and revolutionary young people are able to engender. On the whole I believe that today's young people are the most interested, informed, and concerned generation our Nation has seen for a long time. They do more than talk about the issues. They look for constructive solutions and then work for the adoption of their proposals.

An excellent example of the constructive nature of today's young people was the simulated congressional session held by the Plymouth, Mich., American history classes. These students, who represent a cross section of students throughout the Nation, produced some very thoughtful "bills" during their session.

Because I believe all of us as Members of Congress are interested in the thoughts and ideas of America's young people, I submit their bills at this point in the RECORD:

AN AMENDMENT TO AUTHORIZE THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A NATIONAL MINIMUM VOTING AGE

quire the use of any test or device as a prerequisite for registration or voting.

2. No State or political subdivision may deny any qualified voter, formerly a resident of that State or political subdivision, the right to vote in any presidential election, if that person does not meet the residency and registration requirements of that State or political subdivision in which that person resides at the time of that election.

(B) If the support group is too strong, an adequate force will remain to protect the said personnel. The remainder may either return to the regular U.S. Army, or by their choice become a unit of the South Vietnamese Army (with South Vietnam's approval) and thus severing all ties and support from the U.S. Army.

(b) providing food, housing, and etc.

(c) develop a practical education system through the Peace Corps.

SEC. 3. Any American in Vietnam is responsible to the committee, with the exception of regular combat army units (not the volunteer support group) who are stationed in Vietnam for Defensive action only. EMERGENCY

HON. WILLIAM LLOYD SCOTT

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, on March 24, an editorial appeared in the Richmond Times-Dispatch, a daily newspaper published in the capital city of Virginia and which serves my congressional district, entitled "Emergency." This editorial is related not only to the postal strike but also to possible strikes by other public and quasi-public workers. It brings out the fact that a strike by public employees is not only illegal but a felony and states that if the right of public employees to strike and to shut down essential government activities in defiance of law is permitted, the state of emergency can pass to a state of ruin.

In my opinion, this is a very thoughtful editorial alerting us to the danger of any change in thinking that would shift public opinion away from the rule of law upon which this and all orderly societies are based. While I do not advocate making an example of the postal workers who went out on strike or dealing harshly with individual workers, I do believe the Government has an obligation to see that the leadership is taught that defiance of law will not result in personal benefit to individuals or organizations.

The editorial is set forth below:

EMERGENCY

President Nixon is only partly right. A state of emergency does indeed exist in this nation, but it was not created over the weekend by the outrageous postal strike that has crippled a service essential to the life of the country.

The postal strike is but the latest, and most dramatic, manifestation of an ugly, virulent attitude that has been spreading through the United States for the past several years. It is an attitude that holds established prosesses of government in utter contempt and favors coercion as the principal instrument for achieving a particular goal. This pernicious doctrine is gnawing at the very fabric of our society, making it ever more susceptible to lawlessness.

Our legislative bodies, designed to represent all the people, not just groups with power and pressure, are too slow for some members of the Now Generation. So are our courts. Rather than work through such bodies to promote their causes, some impatient organizations take to the streets and attempt to force governments to accede to their demands. The rights of the majority may be overwhelmed by the wishes of a minority.

Civil rights activists helped to popularize such tactics in the years following the United States Supreme Court's school desegregation decision 16 years ago. Opponents of the war in Vietnam have used them. So have students, foes of public work projects and others. Is there a program or a project or a law that displeases somebody? Well, there's an excellent chance that eventually there'll be an organized extralegal or illegal move against it. Even Richmond's City Council was told that unless it rescinded a ban on leaf-burning, some residents of the newly annexed area might stage a "burn-in" to show their contempt for the law.

That illegal tactics are sometimes used to promote a noble cause or to discredit a bad law does not justify them. Mobs of the Old West occasionally lynched a guilty horse thief, but who would attempt to defend lynching?

The postal strike is illegal, no question about that. At least 15 years ago, Congress enacted a law making it a felony for a federal worker to strike. Each striking postal worker is subject to a $1,000 fine and up to a year and a day in jail.

But the view that public employes should not strike is older, much older than that law. When he was governor of Massachusetts in 1919, Calvin Coolidge supported the dismissal of some striking Boston policemen, saying "there is no right to strike against the public safety by anybody, anywhere, anytime."

But strike the postal workers did. What inspired such audacity? Successful displays of force by other groups, including other public employes, that's what. New York City especially has a history of appeasing illegal strikers—garbage collectors, transit workers and others. If these men could defy the law and profit as a result, postal workers must have asked themselves, why can't we?

Now the nation faces a severe test. It cannot allow the postal workers to bully it into action on postal pay increases, no matter how desirable such increases might be, and it cannot allow those responsible for this challenge to the no-strike law to get away with what they have done.

Even if President Nixon succeeds in delivering the mail with troops, and even if postal workers do return to work promptly, the United States government—and established authority throughout the land—will be in deep trouble unless somebody is punished for this illegal strike. Other groups of public employes throughout the United States, seeing that they can strike with impunity, might be encouraged to follow the postal workers' lead. And special interest groups might be more convinced than ever that the best way to get action from a government is to threaten to disrupt it in some serious way.

Unless this notion is squashed immediately, the United States will pass from a state of emergency to a state of ruin.

BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE CELEBRATION

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, freedom of the individual is the highest goal of man. It is to this end that all should aspire. Those already enjoying the fruits of liberty and democracy must work for those still restricted and oppressed. It is with this in mind that I rise today to pay tribute to the people of Byelorussia who today celebrate the 52d anniversary of the Byelorussian Declaration of Independence. I urge the continuance of the pursuit of the liberty and freedom of all people.

LABOR SECRETARY SHULTZ ON THE NEW FEDERALISM

HON. WILLIAM A. STEIGER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, Secretary of Labor George Shultz addressed the management conference of the Graduate School of Business, University of Chicago, last week.

His speech is excellent and one of the best presentations of the new federalism of the Nixon administration I have seen.

I intend to insert the full text at the end of my remarks, but because it is a lengthy address I would like to highlight one particular section.

The credo of the New Federalist, as I see it—is this:

The Secretary said—

We must act as one nation in determining national goals;

We must act as a federation of States and localities in meeting those goals, providing leeway for local option and individual diversity;

The Federal government and the courts must provide checks against any unfairness inflicted by local government, and local government must be able to provide checks against unfairness caused by national standards;

Power must be permitted to seek its own level of efficient response, flowing to that level of government closest to the people and willing and able to exercise it;

Local innovation and voluntary action must be aggressively encouraged, which limits the liability of the failure of worthwhile experiments and raises the chances of finding practical solutions;

We must reinstill a new respect for individual responsibility and personal freedom, recognizing that the dignity of work is the counterpart of human dignity;

The individual citizen must think and act on two levels: He must contribute to the determination of our national goals and then must involve himself locally in making those goals a reality where he lives.

This may not seem like a revolutionary credo, but if it is followed in our time, it could have the same revolutionary impact that followed the acceptance of the ideas of the original Federalists.

The complete text follows:

ADDRESS BY SECRETARY OF LABOR GEORGE P. SHULTZ

I don't think the Nixon Administration is being well enough criticized.

I did not say we weren't being criticized enough. I said not well enough. Here is what I mean:

In domestic as well as in foreign affairs, the President is pursuing a strategy. You may not agree with his strategy; but I think you owe it to yourselves to come to grips with that strategy, to try to understand this Administration's philosophy, so you can criticize it fairly and constructively.

One of the cliches of this Administration is a phrase taken from professional football—"game plan." Whenever I make a proposal, or whenever we come up with a new tactic, we have to show how it fits in the overall game plan.

Today, I would like to go beyond the confines of being a spokesman in the field of labor, to try to explain what our Administration game plan is. There are some who will call it madness, but even they will have to admit there is some method in it.

Let me begin by suggesting what our method is not. We are not professional zigzaggers. We are not trying to sell liberal principles with conservative rhetoric, or vice versa. We are not trying to heal the nation's differences by "splitting the difference."

Our preference for a theoretical underpinning shows in many ways. At a Washington Redskins football game last season, there was a blatantly bad call by the referee on pass interference. Edward Bennett Williams, owner of the team, yelled "Bad call!" Former Chief Justice Warren, sitting next to him, said in a dignified way "Poor judgment." And Henry Kissinger rose to his feet, shook his fist at the referee, and shouted "On what theory?"

We ask ourselves "on what theory?" all the time. The theory, or political philosophy, that has emerged after one year has been called the New Federalism. I submit to you that it is more than a catch phrase; it is a new approach, one that has evolved from the national experience, one deserving careful analysis by thoughtful men.

To grasp the new approach, you have to cast out one of the basic measurements of political ideology—the idea of liberal versus conservative, the old political spectrum of left and right. It will be a wrench to set aside this familiar caliper, but it does not measure what is going on in government today.

That is because, in the past decade, liberals and conservatives found themselves using the same language in describing their common complaints.

Liberals were complaining that government was becoming unresponsive—that there was a greater need for local and citizen involvement. This sounded like the old conservative demand for decentralization.

Conservatives, on the other hand, were saying that our welfare system and our educational establishment were in need of fundamental reform, to correct the unfairness built in over three decades of trying to cure social ills. Liberals found little to argue about in that.

It was as if the nation had gone through a gigantic half-time and the old opponents had switched sides, each now marching on the other's former goal.

But the change is deeper than that. The change centered on a unique area of agreement. As a Labor Secretary, it is my job to discover areas of agreement in what appear to be positions of great dispute, and I can certainly see one here.

Liberals and conservatives agree on the need for a new fairness in American life. And hopefully, through this new sense of fairness we can achieve greater efficiency in the administration of domestic affairs.

Liberals and conservatives agree on the need for a selective decentralization of government.

Liberals and conservatives agree on a reform of our institutions that makes the setting of national standards a national affair and makes the detailed administration of government programs a very local affair.

The New Federalism broadens and deepens these areas of agreement. In essence, the New Federalism calls upon us to act as one nation in setting the standards of fairness, and then to act as congeries of communities in carrying out those standards. We are nationalizing equity as we localize control, while retaining a continued federal stewardship to insure that national standards are attained.

The best way to explain any theory is to cite examples. And the examples are there, in the field of labor and in many others.

Take welfare. A national sense of fairness says that a man who is working ought to make more than a man who is not working. A national common sense says that a working man who makes less than a man on welfare across the street will be inclined to stop working.

To introduce that element of fairness in our family assistance proposal, we aim to assist the working poor in a way that will always make it profitable to work.

But to permit diversity, to encourage localities and States to make their own decisions on the degree to which they want to help the less fortunate, we provide an income floor but no ceiling. It is up to the States and cities to administer large portions of this program consistent with national goals and to decide for themselves how much more they are able to do.

Thus, we have a national minimum on family assistance—as the President puts it, "no child is worth more in one State than in another," as far as the Federal government is concerned. At the same time, we have local participation in administration and local say-so on what more should be done. National fairness, local diversity.

Take manpower training, really a classic example of this New Federalism. On the national level, we recognize the need for training people for new and better jobs, and the need to fund this activity. But most labor markets are local in scope—this is where the action is and this is where the best judgment concerning the use of resources should be. The basic way we have proposed to handle this situation is to provide incentives for State and local government and private sponsors to get into the act—providing more money and more local control in specific stages, as localities develop the means to put these programs into action. Again, national fairness, local assumption of control.

Another example in the labor area—safety standards. Two million workers a year are injured on the job. On the Federal level the President's proposal would set up a national Occupational Safety and Health Board; its standards are to be adapted and administered by the States, as they demonstrate their capacity to take this over. The enforcement of safety standards is local, with national monitors. The Federal governments pays 90% of the State's planning costs, then shares the administrative costs on a 50–50 basis. Again, national standards, local administration and enforcement, a reserve federal "clout."

Attaining our national goal of equal opportunity in employment is another example of the New Federalism. Where Federal funds are used, affirmative action can be used to eliminate discrimination in employment on the part of management or labor. In our Philadelphia Plan, we put this into practical action in the construction industry for the first time—and not without considerable controversy. But there is no necessity for the mechanical application of Federal standards if the local people can work out a strong agreement among themselves. In this case, as in so many others, there is no solution like a hometown solution—provided it works toward our national goal.

I could cite a dozen other examples of this New Federalist approach—in our environmental program, that sets anti-pollution standards and provides for local enforcement and a sharing of the financing of treatment facilities; in tax policy, that removes seven million poor from the tax rolls and provides a greater incentive to start working; in our computerized job bank, that looks toward a national information system with local and regional participation and control.

In case after case, the pattern is clear—a concern for fairness as a nation, a concern for diversity as a people, a recognition of federal stewardship.

But while it is a clear pattern, it is not a simple one. You cannot label this "decentralization"—because the establishment of so many national standards, in so many fields, is a form of centralization. But this is done in a way that does not dehumanize and depersonalize government, resulting in alienated people and ineffective bureaucracy. It is done in a way that decentralizes administration and encourages local participation, bringing about the best of both worlds—fairness and citizen involvement. At least, that is what we are hoping to do.

By taking this tack, we hope to reinstill in the American people their faith in the responsiveness of their government to what they consider to be fair.

By following this method we call the New Federalism, we hope to reinstill self-reliance on the part of individuals and strength in the institutions of local and State government and voluntary agencies.

And by pursuing these principles, we hope to achieve a society more pluralistic in its operation and more equal in its opportunity. We do not believe that equality of opportunity is the enemy of diversity.

If we are successful with our philosophy—in actually bringing about this realignment of power between the levels of government, what sort of nation will we become?

We will no longer be divided by the fear of centralized domination and the personal alienation such domination always brings.

At the same time we will not be a nation where tranquility and calm and harmony reign supreme. A national nirvana is not in the cards for America.

We have seen what happens in the arena of labor relations when strikes and lockouts and sabotage are replaced by orderly grievance procedures. Labor and management do not become sweethearts; opposing economic forces do not merge their goals. What does happen, in the best of times, is that the force of the antagonism in channeled through an institution that permits progress for all the antagonists.

In the same way, under the New Federalism, the relatively poor will not lose their envy of the rich. The States will not lose their reluctance to part with power to either the local or national government. The federal bureaucracy will not lose its capacity for either initiative or inertia. Tensions will continue to exist, and indeed they should exist—provided we can build those institutions that channel these tensions into progress for all. We are not slicing a pie, we are building a cathedral. Productive tension, the modern descendant of "divine discontent," is the mortar we need to build it.

One job of government in the final third of this century is to encourage competition among the centers of power without allowing it to become cutthroat competition and without taking the easy way out toward the monopoly of centralization. To abolish all tension would be to lose our freedom; we intend to harness tension and make it productive.

On the basis of the examples I have given you this evening I believe you can discern a strategy that is being put into action. It may be helpful to those who like to plot our future moves, because the New Federalism approach of this Administration has built in to government not only credibility, but predictability. It will be useful in doing what I said was needed at the beginning of my talk: in criticizing us about how well we do what we have set out to do.

The credo of the New Federalist, as I see it, is this:

We must act as one nation in determining national goals;

We must act as a federation of States and localities in meeting those goals, providing leeway for local option and individual diversity;

The Federal government and the courts must provide checks against any unfairness inflicted by local government, and local government must be able to provide checks against unfairness caused by national standards;

Power must be permitted to seek its own level of efficient response, flowing to that level of government closest to the people and willing and able to exercise it;

Local innovation and involuntary action must be aggressively encouraged, which limits the liability of the failure of worthwhile experiments and raises the chances of finding practical solutions;

We must reinstill a new respect for individual responsibility and personal freedom, recognizing that the dignity of work is the counterpart of human dignity;

The individual citizen must think and act on two levels: He must contribute to the determination of our national goals and then must involve himself locally in making those goals a reality where he lives.

This may not seem like a revolutionary credo, but if it is followed in our time, it could have the same revolutionary impact that followed the acceptance of the ideas of the original Federalists.

In spelling out the fundamental principles of a new approach to government, I have had to oversimplify. In actual operation, it is infinitely complex—far more complex, I submit, than a doctrinaire liberalism or conservatism.

These are some of the questions we face in putting these principles into practice:

What issues or problems lend themselves to national standards and which do not? For example, air and water pollution, crossing interstate lines, calls for a national approach—and an interstate highway system can hardly be developed on the basis of purely local initiative. On the other hand, a broad range of municipal and State services are better dealt with entirely at that level, assuming that these services can be adequately financed. That is what the President's proposed Revenue Sharing Plan is all about. Nevertheless, the question is a tough one and the answer is as tough, or perhaps complex, as the question itself.

Another complex question: How can we be sure, in the process of decentralization, that the local government can handle the job? To paraphrase a revolutionary slogan, decentralization without preparation is abdication. For example, we know it would be far more effective for local government to administer our manpower training programs. When you sit in Washington and pull the strings, you discover an awful lot of slack in almost every string. On the other hand—there's that phrase again—when you sit in Omaha and a Federal program is dumped in your lap, you are not likely to have the organization to make use of it effectively. What we have done in this situation is to get up a phased-in decentralization. Planning money is provided 90% by the Federal government; as soon as a State shows it has a plan to handle program administration, it gets administrative control of part of the program; as soon as that plan reaches a certain level of success, it earns a large slice of control, until, at its own pace, it is ready to handle the entire administrative job.

Another complexity: How do we decentralize when local political boundaries make little economic sense? A labor market does not live within a city limits, and a transportation system doesn't end at the county line. For this reason, in many cases we have been encouraging metropolitanism, or regional planning, in an effort to help make the political system fit the problems it is called on to meet, and not the other way around.

Let me conclude with a reference that illustrates in a different way the spirit of the New Federalism.

Those of you who are familiar with industrial relations know about "the Hawthorne effect." Some years ago, experiements were conducted at the Hawthorne Works of the Western Electric Company in Chicago. These experiments dealt with the effect of different physical variables on productivity. One of these variables was the intensity of the lighting. The workers were told that the light level of their work area would be raised to see if productivity increased. It was, and it did, to the accompaniment of much attention to the experiment and the workers involved. The light was increased some more, and again productivity rose. Then somebody had the bright—or dim—idea of telling them the lighting would be lowered to its original level and, surprisingly enough, productivity still rose. This experiment led to the identification of the so-called "Hawthorne effect". The level of lighting wasn't nearly as important as the active participation and sense of importance of the workers in the experiment.

I have not told this story merely to revalidate my academic credentials. In government today, we are involving the people in an experiment to replace the deadening "Washington effect" with a constructive "Hawthorne effect". The very fact of our effort to try a new approach, a new experiment in government, involving the people in this experiment, should have a stimulating effect of its own and help make that experiment succeed.

That is what we, as a nation, are searching for. When this Administration is over—hopefully, in the year this nation reaches its 200th anniversary—we hope to have introduced new standards of fairness, new respect for diversity, and a new spirit of confidence in our system of government.

DEFOLIANTS IN VIETNAM

HON. JOHN DELLENBACK

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. DELLENBACK. Mr. Speaker, on February 9, I inserted into the RECORD Thomas Whiteside's excellent New Yorker article concerning the effects of defoliants upon the people and environment of Vietnam. In the March 14 issue of that magazine, Mr. Whiteside has amplified his previous effort by comparing the concentrations of chemical herbicides used in Vietnam with those permissible in the United States.

There is overwhelming evidence that defoliants produce extensive skin eruptions, disorders of the nervous system, fatigue, and depression. It is our domestic practice that, when doubt is cast regarding the safety of a substance produced for human consumption, the Food and Drug Administration immediately withdraws that product from the market. The dioxin contaminants in 2,4,5T produce birth deformities, yet this herbicide continues to be used in Vietnam. Moreover, the rates of concentration are 13 times greater than those considered safe and effective by the manufacturer.

In October 1969, Dr. Lee DuBridge restricted the use of 2,4,5T to those areas of Vietnam remote from population. In addition, he ordered the FDA to find a safe level of concentration of 2,4,5T or cancel permits for its domestic use on January 1, 1970. I was very pleased to learn of Dr. DuBridge's position. My colleagues might be interested to know that today I addressed a letter of inquiry to Dr. DuBridge concerning discrepancies between U.S. policy and practice with regard to potentially dangerous chemical herbicides. In addition, I commend the following most recent New Yorker article to the Congress:

DEPARTMENT OF AMPLIFICATION

NEW YORK,
March 5, 1970.

The EDITORS,
The New Yorker.

DEAR SIRS: In an article that appeared in The New Yorker on February 7th, I wrote that Dr. Lee DuBridge, the President's science adviser, issued a statement last October at the White House saying that because a laboratory study had shown a "higher than expected number of deformities" in the fetuses of mice and rats exposed to the herbicide 2,4,5–T, agencies of the United States government would take action to restrict the use of that substance in this country and in Vietnam, where it was being used in extensive military defoliation operations. This action, Dr. DuBridge announced, would include the cancellation, by January 1st of this year, of Department of Agriculture permits for the use of 2,4,5–T on some American food crops unless the Food and Drug Administration had by then been able to determine a safe concentration of the herbicide in foods. Dr. DuBridge further announced that the Department of Defense would thenceforth "restrict the use of 2,4,5–T to areas remote from the population" in Vietnam. His statement added that these actions and others "will assure the safety of the public while further evidence [of the alleged harmful effects of 2,4,5–T] is being sought."

Four months have passed, and 2,4,5–T is still being used as widely as ever. The Department of Agriculture has yet to cancel its permits for the use of the herbicide on food crops in this country, and the Department of Defense is continuing to use it in populated areas of Vietnam. In the meantime, officials of the Dow Chemical Company, which is one of the largest producers of 2,4,5–T, have been maintaining that the samples of 2,4,5–T used in the study cited by Dr. DuBridge, which was done by the Bionetics Research Laboratories, of Bethesda, Maryland, were uncharacteristic of the 2,4,5–T currently being produced, because the material tested by Bionetics—which did not come from Dow—was contaminated to an unusual extent by a toxic substance identified as symmetrical 2,3,6,7–tetrachlorodibenzo-p-dioxin. This contaminant, usually called dioxin, was alleged by the Dow people to be present in the Bionetics samples at a concentration of approximately twenty-seven parts per million, and they claim that the 2,4,5–T that Dow is currently producing contains the dioxin contaminant in concentrations of less than one part per million. The Dow people maintain that their currently produced 2,4,5–T does not appear to have the effect of deforming rat fetuses. In January, a Dow official told the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, "We strongly urge that action concerning the status of 2,4,5–T be held in abeyance until [Dow's] testing program is completed [in] April." The United States government's failure so far to place the promised restrictions on the use of 2,4,5–T in this country may in part be attributed to this plea.

Because of the seriousness of the issues involved, it seems to me that the government's failure to act on the use of 2,4,5-T here and in Vietnam calls for much fuller public discussion. Even though the dioxin contaminant may now be present in 2,4,5-T in what the Dow Chemical Company apparently considers to be no more than tolerable amounts, the substance is of such potency that its release even in small concentrations must prompt deep concern. In the presumably more heavily dioxin-contaminated samples of 2,4,5-T that were used in the Bionetics work, the smallest dosages of 2,4,5-T that the test animals were given caused extensive deformities in fetuses. In more recent studies of the dioxin contaminant, conducted by Dr. Jacqueline Verrett, of the Food and Drug Administration (who earlier was responsible for revealing the carcinogenicity of cyclamates), extensive teratogenic, or fetus-deforming, effects were discovered in chick embryos when the dioxin, or a distillate predominantly consisting of it, was present at concentrations of little more than a trillionth of a gram per gram of the egg. The magnitude of this effect on chick embryos may be gathered from the fact that, according to Dr. Verrett's studies, the dioxin appears to be a million times as potent a fetus-deforming agent as the notorious teratogen thalidomide was found to be in tests on chicks. Of course, chick embryos are far down the biological ladder from human fetuses, and they are also extremely sensitive to many substances.

But even if, for theoretical purposes, we reduced the teratogenic power of the dioxin, as shown in Dr. Verrett's chick-embryo studies, approximately a million times, we would still have to consider that we were dealing with a substance as teratogenically potent as thalidomide. That the United States government permits, the presence, even in minute amounts of such a substance in herbicidal mixtures to be sold for spraying on food crops and on suburban lawns—where some of the chemical may enter shallow wells and other drinking-water supplies—is hardly reassuring. And it is particularly disturbing when one reflects that in the quarter of a century in which 2,4,5-T was used prior to Dr. DuBridge's announcement not a single regulatory agency of the United States government, nor the Department of Defense—which has been spreading huge quantities of 2,4,5-T on vast areas of Vietnam—and not, as far as is known, the researchers for any one of the half-dozen large American chemical companies producing the material had ever so much as opened up a pregnant mouse to determine whether 2,4,5-T or the dioxin contaminant in it did any systemic or pathogenic harm to the fetus. Several studies of the sort are now under way, but the United States government still seems to take the position that the 2,4,5-T produced by Dow and other large chemical companies should be considered innocent until it is proved to be otherwise. Meanwhile, 2,4,5-T is being sprayed on certain crops and on areas where it may come into contact with human beings, cattle, and wildlife. In Vietnam, it is still being sprayed by the military in concentrations that average thirteen times as great as those that the manufacturers themselves recommended as safe and effective for use in this country.

It is true that the teratogenicity of dioxin—as distinct from dioxin-contaminated 2,4,5–T—has not yet been established in tests conducted on experimental animals of mammalian species. However, the direct toxic, or body-poisoning, effects—as distinct from fetus-deforming effects—of dioxin are known to be very high both in animals and in human beings. In past studies on rats, dosages of forty-five millionths of a gram per kilo of the mother's body weight have been found to kill fifty per cent of the offspring. When dioxin was given orally to pregnant rats in recent tests, it was found, on preliminary investigation, to kill all fetuses with dosages of eight millionths of a gram per kilo of the mother's body weight, and to damage fetuses with dosages of a half-millionth of a gram per kilo.

Further, the effects of dioxin on human beings, even in small dosages, are known to be serious. In the past, in plants manufacturing 2,4,5–T an illness called chloracne seems to have been widespread among the workers. In the mid-sixties, Dow was obliged to close down part of a 2,4,5–T plant in Midland, Michigan, for some time because about sixty workers contracted chloracne as a result of contact with dioxin, which seems to be always present in varying degrees during the process of manufacturing 2,4,5–T and in the finished 2,4,5–T itself. The symptoms of this disease include extensive skin eruptions, disorders of the central nervous system, chronic fatigue, lassitude, and depression. Workers at a 2,4,5–T plant in New Jersey run by another company suffered similar symptoms in the mid-sixties, and six years later some of them were reported to be still suffering from the effects of the disease. In Germany, since the mid-fifties, workers in factory after factory producing 2,4,5–T and polychlorophenolic compounds have been afflicted with chloracne after absorbing apparently only minute amounts of the dioxin contaminant; their symptoms have been described in several medical papers as including liver damage, nervous and mental disorders, depression, loss of appetite and weight, and markedly reduced sexual drive.

A few weeks ago, when a reporter approached an official in Dr. DuBridge's office for information on 2,4,5–T he was told that he would be given White House cooperation "only to a certain extent," because the official didn't want "wild speculation" stirred up. He cited as an example of "wild speculation" the recent controversy over the birth-control pill, which, he said, had "caused millions of women to get hysterical with worry." The reporter replied that he didn't think the analogy between 2,4,5–T and the Pill was a particularly good one, for the reason that a women using the Pill could employ alternative methods of contraception, whereas a Vietnamese woman exposed to herbicidal spray put down by the American military had no choice in the matter.

But perhaps the comparison between 2,4,5-T (and its dioxin contaminant) and commonly used pills is worth pursuing. Suppose that such a dangerous substance as dioxin were found to be contained in a pill offered for human consumption in this country, and suppose that the contaminant were present in such minute amounts that an adult following the prescribed dosage might ingest a hundredth of a millionth of a gram of the contaminant per day. There is no doubt whatever that, according to existing Food and Drug Administration standards, the F.D.A. would immediately ban production and sale of the pill on the ground that it was highly dangerous to public health; in fact, the amount of such a potent contaminant that the F.D.A. would permit in a pill under the agency's present policy on toxicity would almost certainly be zero.

While 2,4,5-T, with or without the dioxin contaminant, doesn't come in pill form, it may be worthwhile to try to calculate, on the basis of a hypothetical pill, how much 2,4,5-T (and dioxin) a Vietnamese woman living in an area sprayed by the American military might ingest in a day. It has already been calculated by reputable biologists that, if one takes into account the average amount of 2,4,5-T sprayed per acre in Vietnam, and also takes into account a one-inch rainfall—such as is common there—after a spraying, a forty-kilo (about eighty-eight-pound) Vietnamese woman drinking two litres (about two quarts) of 2,4,5-T-contaminated water per day could be ingesting about a hundred and twenty milligrams (about two-hundred-and-fiftieth of an ounce) of 2,4,5-T a day. If the 2,4,5-T contained the dioxin contaminant at a level of one part per million—which is what the Dow people say is the maximum amount present in the 2,4,5-T they are currently producing—the Vietnamese woman would be absorbing a little over a tenth of a microgram of dioxin per day, or ten times the amount of dioxin entering the system of an adult from the hypothetical pill that the F.D.A. would certainly find dangerous to human health.

Further, if this Vietnamese woman were to conceive a child two weeks, say, after the spraying, the weight of the dioxin that by these same calculations would have then accumulated in her system (the evidence thus far is that dioxin accumulates in mammalian tissue in the same manner as the chlorinated hydrocarbons, such as DDT) would be more than the weight of the just-fertilized ovum. Considering the existing evidence of the frightening degree of tetratogenicity of the dioxin in chick embryos and its highly toxic effects on mammalian fetuses, the presence of this much dioxin in a mother's body at the very beginning of a human life surely has ominous implications.

Now, what about the safety of 2,4,5-T itself? Admittedly, the dioxin contaminant seems to be a residue from one stage of its manufacture. But if by some future chemical miracle the very last trace of dioxin could be removed from the finished 2,4,5–T, would the resultant "pure" 2,4,5-T be harmless? The fact seems to be that even then 2,4,5-T, as produced in this country, would have to be viewed with suspicion, for the breakdown products of 2,4,5-T, when subjected to heat and other conditions, are themselves capable, according to a number of responsible biologists, of producing dioxin. Given this potential, the ultimate folly in our defoliation operations in Vietnam was possibly achieved during 1965 and 1966, when the military made large-scale efforts in two defoliated areas to create fire storms—that is, fires so huge that all the oxygen in those areas would be exhausted. The apparent intention was to render the soil barren. (A fire storm would also, of course, have the result of burning or suffocating any living beings remaining in the area.) Operation Sherwood Forest, conducted in 1965, was an attempt to burn a defoliated section of the Boi Loi Woods. In October, 1966, the military began Operation Pink Rose, a similar project. Neither of the projects, in which tons of napalm were thrown down on top of the residue of tons of sprayed 2,4,5-T, succeeded in creating the desired effect; whether they released into the atmosphere dioxin produced by the breakdown products of the 2,4,5–T will probably never be known.

There are also less spectacular ways in which conditions suitable for the release of dioxin in Vietnam may have been created. For example, after areas accessible by road have been defoliated, woodcutters move in to chop up the dead timber, which is then carted off to nearby towns and sold as firewood. Large quantities of it are said to have been entering Saigon for years. Since the fires are customarily tended by Vietnamese women, and since many of them are certainly pregnant, the hazards to health and to the lives of unborn children surely cannot be ignored.

In the United States, the potential hazards from the present use of 2,4,5-T are considerably less than they are in Vietnam. In the first place, the recommended concentrations of 2,4,5-T for spraying here are, as I have pointed out, about a thirteenth of what the Vietnamese population is sometimes subjected to. And, in the second place, a great deal, if not most, of the 2,4,5-T that would otherwise have been sprayed on American crops and grazing areas has for several years been sent to Vietnam. However, the shortage of 2,4,5-T in this country does not necessarily mean that the potential hazards are at a minimum. The substances known as the trichlorophenols and compounds of pentachlorophenol, which officials of the F.D.A. believe may be chemical precursors of dioxin under certain thermal and other conditions, are used widely in the manufacture of a large variety of consumer products, ranging from paper to laundry starch and hair shampoo. Dow Chemical puts out a whole line of polychlorophenolic chemicals known as Dowicide Products. Monsanto Chemical also puts out a line of pentachlorophenol substances, known as Penta Compounds. Since a very great many consumer products wind up being burned sooner or later, and since the polychlorophenolic compounds are suspected of being capable, under particular thermal and other conditions, of releasing dioxin, the alarming question arises whether, and to what extent, dioxin is being released into the environment through the atmosphere. Pentachlorophenol, used in certain herbicides, is readily decomposed in sunlight, and in its breakdown process a number of products, including chemical precursors of chlorodibenzo-p-dioxin compounds, are produced. Because of these factors, a whole range of pesticides, as well as of herbicides, now must come under suspicion of producting dioxin compounds.

Although the chemical companies that manufacture 2,4,5-T have long taken pride in pointing out that 2,4,5-T itself is quite readily decomposable in soil, the crucial matters of how stable the dioxin contaminant is and to what extent it is cumulative in animal tissue have apparently been neglected. Consequently, the fact that traces of compounds virtually indistinguishable from dioxin have already been detected in this country in the human food chain—in the livers of chickens and in edible oils—clearly indicates that dioxin should be considered a hazard to man. Why, under all these inauspicious circumstances, the production and the use here and in Vietnam of 2,4,5-T has not summarily been stopped by the United States government is hard to understand.

Sincerely,

THOMAS WHITESIDE.

GALLAGHER SEES JERSEY CITY HOUSING AUTHORITY AS "SHOWCASE FOR THE NATION"

HON. CORNELIUS E. GALLAGHER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, it has been one of my great privileges during my terms in the Congress to work with the Jersey City Housing Authority of Jersey City, N.J.

The Jersey City Housing Authority has demonstrated itself to be one of the most effective, creative, and successful agencies of its kind in the United States.

It has led the battle for more and better quality low-income housing, for better facilities for our elderly citizens, for improved recreational centers in low-income areas. Last year, I was pleased to join with the authority in bringing a "meals-on-wheels" program to Jersey City. We have provided for school breakfast programs through the authority. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the list of accomplishments are endless.

As our Nation attempts to grapple with the problems of urban America, I can think of no example more worth following than that of the Jersey City Housing Authority; it truly is a showcase for the Nation.

Thus, in order that all of our Members may learn for themselves of the authority's structure and programs, I am pleased to insert an article covering those topics at this point in the RECORD:

JERSEY CITY HOUSING AUTHORITY "SOCIAL GOALS" PROGRAM IS SHOWCASE FOR THE NATION

"Housing the low income families means more than collecting rents, and seeing that heating and utilities are available." So declared Ettore Vignone, executive director of the Jersey City Housing Authority.

The housing official in a statement said "the involvement of our people with new social goals in mind is paramount if a total housing job is to be done. Complete cooperation of all community agencies, both public and private, is important", he said.

Under the terms of the cooperation agreement cities have with the federal government, communities are responsible for such services to public housing as police and fire protection, educational programs, medical facilities, garbage removal, recreation, and the availability of utilities and related items.

"Beyond these services, however, we find that all low-income families, not only those living in public housing, need a consideration of social programs which will bring them programs improving their health, and those of social, cultural, and educational enrichment," said the housing official.

"Acompanying the necessity of tying in social programming with public housing families, this agency began more than 15 years ago to develop needed programs. At that time when Mayor Kenny was in office, we started the first of our Baby Keep Well Stations which provides preventative maintenance for the pre-school child," he said.

"It has been in the last ten years, however," said Vignone "that our public has really gone to fore through the activity of our tenant service and tenant relations office."

Noting that the Jersey City Housing Authority is the second largest in the state with over 4,000 families containing more than 14,000 individuals, Vignone reports they have almost 7,000 children among their families. Among the 4,000 families there are more than 1,500 of the senior citizen classification.

Developing the programs for the Jersey City Housing Authority is the direct responsibility of Tenant Services Director Conrad J. Vuocolo and his staff. Programs are developed in the fields of economic opportunity, education, recreation, health, arts and crafts, community responsibility, consumer education, nutrition programming, planned parenthood, mental health, and cultural enrichment, which includes visits to parks and playgrounds. Most of the programs are sponsored in conjunction with an assisting community agency, for example, there are eight Head Start classes using public housing facilities committing more than 150 children from in and around the neighborhood to attend the pre-school classes. This program is sponsored by Jersey City Can Do.

The Jersey City Board of Education has six classrooms for children in the housing area from the Kindergarten to the 8th grade. About 225 children attend these classes which are located on the first floor of one of the buildings in Montgomery Gardens. The placing of these classrooms in the public housing location is unique in the area and the program is now entering its sixth year. It began at the request of the Jersey City Board of Education to allow the children to attend a full class day and relieve over-crowding in the neighborhood school.

The State of New Jersey Department of Institutions and Agencies operates a Day Care Center, the first of its type in public housing in the state in the Booker T. Washington developments where 50 children attend classes everyday which allows working mothers of those in need of some assistance in the care of their children. This program is under the direction of the Bureau of Children's Services of the New Jersey Department of Institutions and Agencies and is paid for out of state funds.

The Jersey City Division of Medical Services operates Baby Keep Well Stations for the pre-school children at the A. Harry Moore Apartments, Currie Woods, Cerosky Apartments, in the Marion section, and Montgomery Gardens. Thousands of children receive immunizations and weekly attention from pediatricians.

The same facility is used on alternate days by the Hudson County Planned Parenthood Association which operates clinics on alternate days in several of these locations.

Another day brings the Mount Carmel Guild and the Jersey City Department of Health under the supervision of Walter Lezynski into the clinical area with a family counselling team to assist those with emotional and other family problems. Almost 200 attend these clinics, many of them in the senior citizen category.

At Berry Gardens, The Jersey City Division of Medical Services under the direction of Dr. Patrick F. McGovern provides a geriatrics clinic one day a week as part of Mayor Thomas Whelan's neighborhood community health program.

Last year a nutrition clinic was directed by Mrs. Hanna Waterman, City Nutritionist, who worked at Berry Gardens Health Clinic, striving to tie in nutritional needs with extra food programs available through Food Stamps and Commodities Distributing programming sponsored by the United States Department of Agriculture.

This month several hundred senior citizens received free vaccines in the Health Clinic at Berry Gardens.

Job opportunities is a primary goal of our public housing agency said Board Chairman Frank Tedesco. Six years ago we started Project Job (Just One Break) and since then more than 1,000 of our tenants had some economic enrichment through programs we sponsored in the work field for the young and old, plus white collar and blue collar positions made available in the maintenance and management divisions of our agency. Tedesco said in addition to these jobs, we constantly contact those we do business with in private industry striving to map their needs with the talents of one of our tenants.

This agency has been funded by the United States Department of Labor for the last five years with a Neighborhood Youth Corps program which has permitted more than 3,000 Jersey City youngsters to work during the summer and after school at jobs in public and private community agencies whereby they can earn about $1,500 per year.

These programs are known as Project Learn-Earn and Operation Step-Up. For the past two years the Housing Authority has received grants from the State Department of Economic Development which has permitted children to make bus trips to parks and playgrounds and places of historical interest. "This has been incorporated with Operation-Take-A-Trip which was started in 1958 by the Housing Authority and has resulted with more than 75,000 children being involved," said Frank Berrell, director of finance for the agency.

The agency also received the very first senior citizen work program in the nation when Operation Service was funded which permits 39 of the over 65 year old set to earn $1.60 per hour working 25 hours a week in various community services.

Through Jersey City State College the agency has a contract for the last five years which allows students from that institution to work in and around the housing developments in the College Work-Study Program. They work as clerical aids, in recreation programs, as tutoring aids, and some are assigned to agencies which cooperate with the housing administration. More than 300 college students have obtained experience in working with the inner city youth while earning money during the summer and after school.

There is a senior citizen recreation program which is sponsored by the Jersey City Department of Recreation in five of the developments, which has a high number of the elderly under the direction of Miss Carla Edwards teaching the elderly on the preparation of seasonal articles which are put on display in an annual senior citizen hobby show which is sponsored each May by the Housing Authority.

For the youngsters, Jersey City State College students and Neighborhood Youth Corps high school students through Operation Step-Up bring a vast array of recreational programs during the summer. Last year over 5,000 took part in the various types of programs, which include arts and crafts, track and field events, baseball and basketball competitions, and swim meets.

In cooperation with Jersey City Can Do, the Housing Agency has provided space in Hudson Gardens for the Jersey City Meals On Wheels. This program is designed to bring hot, nutritional meals right into the homes of the confined elderly under the direction of Mrs. Mary Johnson and since it was started in June 1967 almost 40,000 such meals have been served, according to Housing Commissioner Samuel DiFeo.

Dr. William G. Wilkerson, vice-chairman of the NAACP said he is of the opinion that social involvement programs have helped to keep the community stable. "I especially liked the attitude of our employees toward the tenants. We are pleased that all the Jersey City Housing employees attended a 13 week seminar on Human Relations several years ago sponsored by Jersey City State College", said Wilkerson. "To my knowledge ours was the first agency in the United States to have such a program with a college or a university," he said.

High on the priority list with the local agency is serving our ever-growing senior citizen population, according to Commissioner Stanley Shableski. More than 100 employees and tenants have been trained in a Friendly Visitors program which under the direction of the New Jersey Department of Chronic Illness Control has given us a program which brings comfort and assistance to many of those who are shut in and alone. They visit in the apartments upon invitation and sit down helping with cooking, house maintenance, going to the store, accompanying a person to a hospital, reading to a blind person, or writing a letter for an arthritic victim. "These services which are voluntary in nature help provide some glimmer of hope to our people who have these problems," said Vignone.

The housing agency has cooperated with high school counsellors, and the three local universities, St. Peter's College, JCSC, and Rutgers University, in their Upward Bound Programs. "More than 100 public housing youngsters are now attending colleges, which would have been impossible a few years ago," said Commissioner Rafael Bou. "Our community is pleased," said Bou, "to learn of the close cooperation between the Tenant Service Office and ASPIRA, a nonprofit agency which is making college opportunities for youngsters of Puerto Rican extraction," Bou added this would have a decided effect on our future generation.

Other programs that the Housing Authority involved itself with is that of drug abuse with the leadership provided by Commissioner Frank Quilty. Employees and tenants groups have visited the Liberty Park Drug Abuse Center in Jersey City, and gained information on the problem.

To help provide for large families the local agency has gone into a program of leased housing and 200 units are being developed for families in more than 30 locations in the city. A program of preventative maintenance is to be given to the families by Peter Kenny, director of maintenance.

Family counselling is provided at least once a year by the housing managers under the direction of Howard J. Curry, department director, and John Connelly, his assistant. "In order to keep abreast of the tenants needs and abilities we maintain a Tenant Analysis Card for each one of our families," said Curry. This card tells the managers at a glance what a family needs are and gives us an opportunity to advise and serve them. In charge of each of the developments management offices are Isiah Oliver, Lafayette Gardens, Andrew Witruk, Cerosky Apartments, Jeanne Donnelly, Booker T. Washington Apartments, Helen McCaffrey, Hudson Gardens, Margaret Kelly, Holland Apartments, Joseph Tyrell, Montgomery Gardens, Andrew J. O'Connor, A. Harry Moore Apartments, Joseph P. Flessey, Currie's Woods Gardens, and Sadie Dohrman, Berry Gardens.

"The newest need we are attempting to fill is in the field of nutrition," said Vuocolo. "Due to the lack of a school breakfast program in Jersey City, we have undertaken a program of trying to bring some nutritional assistance to the thousands of children living in and around the developments." "Last summer with a grant from the New Jersey Board of Education Surplus Commodities from the United States Department of Agriculture and personnel provided by Jersey City State College Work-Study program, senior citizens working in Operation Service, and high school students from Operation Step-Up, plus tenant volunteers, we served more than 54,000 breakfasts in our developments from July 1st to August 30," he said.

"We were pleased," said the housing official "to receive authorization to have an after-school snack program which has been in effect since September 1st. More than 1,200 children get a snack comprised of milk and a sandwich, or bakery product, everyday." He indicated that a dozen mothers are involved in helping to bake for the children each afternoon.

Vignone said that the problem of communication with our tenants is so paramount that we have developed a house organ which is distributed to 5,000 of our tenant families, our employees, and friends each edition. In addition to some of the programs above mentioned, we use this medium to advise of the various children's contest sponsored at Christmas, Easter, Thanksgiving, and Halloween, which provides an outlet for the younger set who are invited to color appropriate pictures.

Of far reaching impact was the opening last November of a PROOF Office which is a new community concept in harnessing resources and programs to aid persons referrals from the New Jersey Department of Institutions and Agencies. This resource center is the first of its type in the nation according to the state office and is funded round the clock through an appropriation by the New Jersey Legislature.

Community responsibility is another important theme of ours, said Alan Kraut, counsel to the agency. We urge the people to take part in community programs serving the less fortunate than they, taking part in community fund drives, and to register for voting. Kraut reports the success of the "Senior Power Program" developed by the Tenant Relations Office which helps the silver-haired set to become involved and to register their needs and abilities with all echelons of government. A special registration drive last summer resulted in more than 200 of the elders voting for the first time.

Vignone reports that excellent community service is also undertaken by the Jersey City Public Library who provides a Bookmobile service which services these developments. More than one-half million books have been circulated since the Bookmobile was provided by Mayor Bernard J. Berry and William Rohrenbeck, City Librarian over 10 years ago. In addition to the traveling mobile unit, senior citizens working under the direction of Mrs. Mary Leary, coordinator of Operation Service, bringing large print books directly to those elders who are infirm or incapacitated. A cart is utilized to carry the books which are well received by the seniors.

An Information Center is provided in the Tenant Services Division which gives up-to-date information regarding Social Security, Veterans Administration, Food Stamps, recreation facilities, and related items to the elderly. This Senior Citizen Information Center was started by this agency in 1952.

A small but important program on beauty culture was organized by this agency and the Jersey City Women's Job Corps located in the Medical Center. Within the last year more than 500 seniors have visited the Cosmetology Department of the Job Corps where they have received free hair, skin, and beauty treatment, provided by the enrollees. This program was established in cooperation with the National Council On Aging with the details cut by John Sheenhan of the NCOA and Vuocolo.

Of special significance to low income families in what seems to be a never ending battle is to stabilize living costs. In this vein the housing agency conducts a continuing consumer education program which in addition to having a 55 week course on consumer problems was held in Montgomery Gardens as a monthly information program.

Government pamphlets are provided on the subject of marketing, food preparation, medical care, and related subjects, by Representative Cornelius E. Gallagher and Dominick V. Daniels. More than 200,000 booklets of this variety have been furnished free to the housing tenants.

Last year State Senator Frank J. Guarini Jr. started a program of obtaining booklets of interest from the New Jersey State Department of Health and other offices.

"Movies and programs on the possibility of our low income tenants taking a giant step toward private home ownership is also planned," said Vuocolo, "as this is our goal for all our families."

Vignone said the 70's should be of interest to our families as we plan further programming which will add to their economic enrichment through our work with the federal job developer in the area plus the Urban League Skills Bank Manpower Development Training Administration under the direction of Frank Cioffi, an affiliated agency. We also hope to have prenatal clinics established in our developments and are planning for community kitchens which will bring low cost meals to our needy and worthy low income senior citizens. We also hope to have a closer tie with a credit unit operation to instill programs of saving and financial programs for our tenants.

In conclusion, Vignone said, "Public housing is intended to be a steppingstone for low-income families and with continuing and expanding interest of public agencies including those in the private variety, public housing will truly reach its goal."

AN ADDICT'S PLEA: A VIABLE APPROACH

HON. SAM STEIGER

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. STEIGER of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, entirely too many youths of the United States suffer from a terrible affliction: they are addicts—misusers of pills, narcotics, LSD, and such. For a multitude of reasons they ignored various warnings on the dangers involved and succumbed to the lure of taking these materials.

Drug abuse was once thought to be almost exclusively done by those of the inner city. To some extent this complacency has contributed to the problem's growth and now few areas of society can say, "It cannot happen here." It is occurring everywhere, among all segments of the population.

This point was made emphatic to me when a friend's daughter, an honor student at college, was arrested. As her letter shows, she is an addict.

TEMPE, ARIZ.,
March 6, 1970.

EDITOR,
The Arizona Republic,
Phoenix, Ariz.

DEAR SIR: For the past three weeks or so you have finally had some very intelligent and true articles on drugs and their abuse in the valley. It is way past it's time—and yet there is still so much to learn that the average person doesn't know or even realize.

I know—because I'm an addict or junkie, whichever. I've been taking drugs for five years—pills (amphetamines and barbiturates), marijuana, LSD, methadrine, experiments in which I had no idea what I was taking, and finally to heroin for the last year. I was arrested recently and possibly am facing five years or more in the state prison. (By the way I'm only a 22 year old girl). Is it worth it? Most definitely no. Not only because of prison but for myself. I ask myself each day if being an addict for the rest of my life is what I want to look forward to—oh my God—how could it be."

I'm paying for my mistakes now. I've broken by parents hearts, I may go to jail, and I have a monkey on my back that will not let go very easily at all. If I never take another bit of heroin in my life I will still be a junkie because when I do take that first one it will start all over again. It isn't quite that easy to stop. It takes time, patience, strong will, and God.

Whether people want to face it or not Arizona is probably second or third in the U.S. for the amount of drugs. And it is about time someone in this state did something about this problem. CODAC has finally emerged—but it needs the help and support of the people in this community to realize what a crucial point drug abuse is today.

I am in a rehabilitation program at St. Lukes. For me and many like me it has been a life-saver. Unfortunately people have only condemned the program for giving outpatient therapy with the use of methadone tablets, a truly miracle drug. People have made such an uproar about giving addicts drugs to use on their own. (You must realize that this drug not only kills pain of withdrawal without a high, but also stops the physical and mental craving for heroin when used sensibly.) Sure, some of the tablets have been found on people who were busted. Not all the people on the program are going to be honest—But that's true of anything.

The main point is that some people are realizing that drug addiction is a sickness like alcoholism—and these people need help. Some doctors, lawyers and those of CODAC are trying to help—but we have to reach the judges, police and the people. When they finally see that if you send an addict to prison you're sending him right back down—to a junkie. There is more heroin and an easier accessibility to it in prison than on the street. And prison is the best school in the world for a criminal. An addict is basically not a criminal but forced there by his addiction.

"Help." cries a junkie. His heart is that cry—only who can help? You can help. But only when you understand the problem and realize most addicts (not hard-core pushers) are humans. Not Animals!

Please support CODAC, and the hospitals and people who understand and know that are trying to help.

I would sincerely like to sign my name, but the reasons are very obvious why I can't. It's very sad that we people can't be a little more understood and free.

Very sincerely yours,

AN ADDICT.

The CODAC mentioned refers to the Community Organization for Drug Abuse Control—1807 North Central Avenue, Phoenix, Ariz. Recognizing the needs in Arizona for a major effort to curtail drug abuse and rehabilitate to the extent possible those who were addicts, representatives from various government and nonprofit agencies and groups gathered together to form CODAC.

The inclusive, wide-ranging nature of this program deserves to be followed throughout the country. It is truly a prototype of the kinds of efforts needed to solve this problem. Arizona is taking the necessary steps in this regard.

In June of 1969 the Drug Abuse Committee of the Maricopa County Medical Society issued a statement that the drug abuse problem among Phoenix area young people had reached epidemic proportions.

Studies made during the past year have shown that an increasing number of young people are experimenting with drugs and an increasing number are becoming addicted to opiates. Figures from these studies show up to 50 percent of our high school age youths experimenting with drugs. And hospitals report a growing number of addicts are coming to them for help.

An indication of the scope of the problem is gained by looking at the record of a typical month's drug activity recorded by the Phoenix Police Department. During the month of September 1969, they confiscated the following: 113 pounds of marihuana; 21 growing marihuana plants; 10 ounces, 2 grams heroine; 7 ounces, 5 grams speed; 164 tablets LSD; 1,255 tablets Benzedrine; 11 ounces peyote; 123 tablets Seconal; 178 tablets other miscellaneous dangerous drugs.

In addition, they participated with the Federal Bureau of Narcotics in the confiscation of 92 kilos of marihuana and 14,000 tablets of LSD.

There are many needs that must be met in our community if we are to effectively combat the abuse of drugs. These needs can be grouped as follows:

First. The need for community involvement and support if programs to combat drug abuse are to be successful.

Second. The need for educational and referral resources.

Third. The need for the establishment of priorities in the development of drug abuse programs.

Fourth. The need for eliminating the fragmentation and duplication of existing programs by a variety of agencies and groups in Maricopa County and the State of Arizona.

Fifth. The need for rehabilitation resources for drug users in Maricopa County, an area which has become even further depleted since the community mental health center had to severely decrease its staff.

In order to combat the abuse of drugs in our community and provide help for those drug-involved individuals desiring it, the Community Organization for Drug Abuse Control, Inc.—CODAC—was formed. CODAC is a compilation of representatives from various governmental and nonprofit agencies and groups working in the area of drug abuse in Maricopa County and the State of Arizona. It functions as an umbrella agency for coordinating the efforts in the area of drug abuse control, and through its affiliated agencies, intends to establish a total program of drug abuse control for Maricopa County and eventually the State of Arizona.

The objectives of CODAC are:

First. To eliminate duplication of efforts in the drug abuse area through coordination of existing and potential programs.

Second. To establish priorities in the following areas and assure that these priorities are met: Education and prevention, treatment and rehabilitation, and training and research.

Third. To stimulate community support for programs to combat drug abuse.

In order to meet our objectives, the following methods will be utilized:

First. CODAC will hold regularly scheduled meetings and mail newsletters to all interested persons with the goal of eliminating duplication and fragmentation of efforts.

Second. Priorities have already been established in the aforementioned areas of education and prevention, treatment and rehabilitation, training and research, and are as follows: They are not arranged in order of importance; rather it is felt that these are priorities which must all be met if we are to effectively combat our problem.

Education and prevention: classroom programs, community-oriented sessions in local areas, seminars for administrators and educators, inservice faculty training courses, professional panels, and dissemination of educational materials.

Treatment and rehabilitation: contact referral centers for young drug users—both actual and potential addicts, detoxification facilities in conjunction with local hospitals, halfway houses for rehabilitation of drug addicts, long-term rehabilitation center for reconstructing individuals whose lives have been deeply disturbed by drug usage, outpatient groups for various kinds of drug-involved individuals, and parent anonymous groups for parents of drug-involved children.

This is, obviously, the most expensive phase of our program and will call for a great deal of financial and planning assistance from Federal, State, and local officials.

Training and research: Training of professional and paraprofessional staffs for treatment and rehabilitation centers, and drug abuse library and information system—computerized retrieval.

An in-depth series was recently run by the Phoenix Gazette on drug abuse and CODAC. I am including it at the end of my remarks in the hope that others will find the information helpful.

The series referred to, follows:

DRUG ABUSE AMONG YOUTHS HERE REACHES "FRIGHTENING PROPORTIONS"

(By Carol Schatt)

A Valley psychologist who has found a rather sudden increase of drug addicts among his patients says of the drug scene in Phoenix:

"Well, it's a disaster."

"It's a phenomenon that has reached such frightening proportions in the last 2½ years," the psychologist said. "Three to five years ago, we didn't have a problem. Today it has devastated homes and lives."

One year ago, a survey of Valley high school students indicated that 30 per cent of Phoenix teen-agers had tried or were using marijuana or drugs.

Today, close observers as well as members of the drug subculture itself say that figure has reached 50 per cent. The percentage of addicts is estimated at 15–20 per cent. And, they add, almost any kind of drug—marijuana, heroin, speed, STP, barbiturates, cocaine, LSD, you-name-it—is readily and easily available.

Even to grade school kids.

Probably first to take note of the leaping incidence of illegal use of drugs were the Phoenix Police Department and state narcotics officials, and the courts.

Law enforcement and court action seemed no more able to control the increase than a twig can stop water gushing from a broken reservoir.

Other organizations developed separate programs to help curb drug abuse. Among them was Dope Stop, designed to offer help to drug abusers, provide answers about drugs and dope, and put the finger on pushers. Dope Stop, the first more-or-less community effort, has since moved into an emphasis on educating high school and grade school students about drug abuse.

Members of the Maricopa County Medical Society's Committee on Drug Abuse recognized, however, the need for a central body to coordinate programs and eliminate duplication of efforts.

Hence in June 1969 the Community Organization for Drug Abuse Control (CODAC) was incorporated to coordinate the efforts of 30 organizations—governmental, professional and business—concerned in the drug war.

Since that time the list of member organizations has grown, and CODAC officials welcome participation by an interested group.

CODAC, at 1807 N. Central, Suite 114, is squaring off against a strong opponent: Drug abuse: Members of the drug subculture are no longer only the poorer area, substandard elements of society. A substantial portion—some say the majority—are the children of affluence.

"They're in the suburbs and Paradise Valley," said one member of the drug subculture. "They have money, cars. They have better education, better clothes, they have better everything and everything isn't where it's at.

"It's not an escape," he said. "They aren't really escaping anything because they have everything. They're looking for something else."

CODAC has no precedent in battle plans to follow. U.S. cities and towns—in fact the very web of American society—have never faced so fearfully and desperately what their children embrace so readily.

BIG ORGANIZED FORCE OFFERS HOPE, HELP TO DRUG ADDICT

(By Carol Schatt)

In the face of a mushrooming dilemma of drug abuse, more than 30 organizations have linked arms to confront the situation with all available resources.

Their coordinating creation, Community Organization for Drug Abuse Control (CODAC), at 1807 N. Central, Suite 114, ties together facilities, funds, manpower and concern of government, businesses and professional groups.

"CODAC is working to wipe out the problems of drug abuse," said Don Jackson, executive director.

Dr. Eugene C. Ryan, one of CODAC's guiding lights and first president of its executive board, explained its four-pronged aims:

Education and prevention.

Treatment and rehabilitation.

Training and research.

Coordination of efforts by various organizations.

Dope Stop, initiated last year by the Maricopa County Mental Health Association, is a preventative education arm of CODAC and utilizes high school volunteers.

"Our chief emphasis is on teen involvement," said Dope Stop voluntary director John French, "in a program aimed at involving high school students to educate grade school students."

Response has been excellent, with more than 1,000 high schoolers now working in the program, he said.

The high school, volunteer "counselors"—non-users of drugs themselves—visit an assigned grade school classroom once a month, discussing sniffing glue and marijuana, in particular, and the pros and cons of taking drugs.

The program emphasizes honesty. If the high school student can't answer a question from his own monthly training sessions (and they're finding the fifth- through eighth graders knowledgeable and sophisticated about drugs), he says so and returns with the answer next session.

"The subtle value of the program," French said, "is to give an image. The grade school kids are realizing that everybody up in high school isn't smoking pot."

"Our sole purpose is educational and aimed at the non-user . . . We present all the facts, ask the children to weigh them and make a decision whether or not to use drugs.

"Not making a decision beforehand is almost a decision to use drugs. When they are faced with the temptation—when they are with friends smoking marijuana, for instance—they will likely make the decision to use drugs."

Dope Stop personnel also coordinate a CODAC speaker's bureau which provides education for the public in the forms of community-oriented sessions, seminars for administrators and educators, in-service faculty training courses, professional panels and dissemination of educational materials.

Another educational arm of CODAC is the Arizona Alcoholic and Narcotic Educational Association.

The second and most expensive thrust of CODAC involves treatment and rehabilitation through five types of facilities.

Contact referral centers, such as Terros House on First Street, where drug users having a bad trip or seeking help may phone 253–3118 anytime.

At Terros, manned by former drug users and an adult supervisor, long-haired counselors "talk down" the drug abuser from a bad trip or arrange emergency medical treatment for him.

Valley hospitals have offered beds for those emergency drug cases. They charge only as much as the patient can pay. Good Samaritan Hospital, the first to cooperate, has spent several thousand dollars of special funds for this purpose.

Terros has been credited with saving 40 lives last fall, and takes about 1,000 phone calls a month.

Detoxification facilities will be provided by hospitals, offering a drug addict the medical care to get his system cleaned out.

Halfway houses where a drug addict can pick himself up in a protected environment.

Two have already been established, both near hospitals. They offer the drug addict an environment out of the drug culture while providing job training through the State Department of Vocation and Rehabilitation.

Psychological counseling and group therapy during an addict's stay at the halfway house help him adjust to life and resolve the psychological problems of dependency on drugs.

One halfway house is being used for narcotic addicts. The second, established only last week, is for pill users (speed freaks, etc.).

A longterm rehabilitation center for reconstructing individuals whose lives have been deeply disturbed by drug usage CODAC is trying to establish such a facility for 1–2 year patients in an isolated area such as the desert or mountain country.

Outpatient groups for various drug-involved individuals as a follow-up to other treatment.

Thus, a drug user conceivably might experience a "bad trip," call Terros and be referred to a hospital for emergency treatment and detoxification, spend a year or two at the longterm rehabilitation center undergoing psychological readjustment, return to a halfway house for a few months as a buffer between himself and society, and get vocational training, and then emerge at last—ready to rejoin society as a self-strong member without the crutch of drugs.

The third thrust of CODAC is the training of personnel to staff the many facilities and do research in drugs. Many physicians today find their medical training outdated and that "the kids know more about drugs" than they.

Putting all this together is a board of directors (about 25 members), helped by a large advisory board and under an executive board of officers.

Up to this point CODAC has been funded strictly from private organizational contributions. Jackson said expenditures have been under $20,000.

CODAC PULLS TOGETHER LOOSE ENDS IN GROWING BATTLE ON DRUG ADDICTS

(By Carol Schatt)

Programs have sprung up all around the country groping their way toward effective control of the misuse of drugs.

Phoenix' program is Community Organization for Drug Abuse Control (CODAC), at 1807 N. Central, Suite 114. It appears to have struck a responsive chord with the community.

"There are lots of programs in the country," said Dr. Eugene Ryan, who served as CODAC's first executive board president. "The thing that amazes them all—in Washington and elsewhere—is the cooperation and coordination CODAC is getting from all groups involved."

Those cooperating in CODAC range from government on all levels to business organizations to professional associations to individuals in the community and members of the drug culture itself. Persons representing those facets of the community serve on CODAC's board of directors and advisory board.

Among groups offering the most cooperation, said Don Jackson, executive director of CODAC, is the Phoenix Police Department.

"I feel sure that CODAC has done two things in the community," said Lt. Hugh Ennis, of the department's bureau of special investigations. "They've helped focus citizen interest and support on the drug problem. And through the work at Terros House, they've saved some lives that wouldn't have been saved otherwise."

Terros House is a facility run by long-haired exdopers who receive calls from persons seeking emergency medical help from a "bad trip." Terros gets about 1,000 calls a month, and its staffers are often instrumental in helping a youngster get off drugs.

Terros, known widely in the dope subculture by word of mouth, advertises "no heat," meaning a youngster in trouble with drugs can get help there without fear of arrest or being turned over to the authorities.

"The police department doesn't ask Terros for any information," Lt. Ennis said, "and Terros doesn't volunteer any."

"Terros is not privileged," he emphasized. The police insist that no drugs can be kept there or used there except under a doctor's administration.

"Everybody wants to help solve the drug problem," Ennis said. "But they're going in different directions. CODAC is pulling them together."

Before CODAC and the Dope Stop educational program in the schools, said Capt. Ralph Milstead, director of training for the department was carrying the load by itself as far as education is concerned."

Previously, police were not only busy with law enforcement of drug abuse, but were doing the only educating against drug abuse.

Sister Francesca Fischer, S. M., administrator of the Narcotic Addict Rehabilitation Act program and assistant administrator of the mental health program at St. Joseph's Hospital and Medical Center, pointed to shifts in the history of drug abuse. The first pattern of drug abuse, she said, was use of marijuana leading to addiction to heroin or new morphine. Now, she said, drug users play with a whole range of drugs, particularly amphetamines, barbiturates and the like.

Nara, one portion of St. Joseph's outpatient mental health program and one arm of the CODAC effort, is a pilot program created by the federal government in 1966 and implemented in 1968. It involves initial evaluation and examination of an addict, followed by hospital treatment at federal facilities in Lexington, Ky., or Ft. Worth, Tex., after which NARA patients are returned to Phoenix for after-care.

NARA, a 36-month program for the ex-addict, has handled 50 to 60 patients, Sister Francesca said, and has met with 30 to 40 per cent success in rehabilitation and cure.

At the turn of the century, she said, middle-class whites were getting hooked on drugs, i.e., through prescriptions and pills. It was later that the heroin problem developed in ghetto areas, "and we weren't too concerned," she said.

Now, however, the hard-drug problem is shifting back to middle-class, white areas while hard drugs are fading in the ghettos and a serious war against abuse begins, she noted.

In fulfilling his campaign promise, Mayor John Driggs said plans are under way to link the City of Phoenix more closely to the CODAC campaign.

"We were working even before the administration took over with many discussions with CODAC officials laying the ground work for action by this city council to implement an expanded drug abuse campaign," Driggs said.

"We have great hope that the efforts of CODAC can be expanded through increased participation by the City of Phoenix," he said.

A state legislator and member of the board of directors pointed to the combination of government and private citizens as the key to success in CODAC's drive.

"I think for the first time we have a blend of government and civic cooperation," said Rep. Timothy Barrow, R-Maricopa "Alone neither could do it sufficiently effectively because there's a good deal of suspicion of government in this area and the public doesn't have the funds."

The campaign against drug abuse is not only that of the "establishment." Twenty-one-year-old Tim Walters, spokesman for Terros House, said, "The whole answer to getting people off drugs is the peer group."

"It's not so much the drugs, it's the subculture," he said. "Young people can wind up in the drug scene for several reasons among them a sense of alienation from parents and closer identification with friends."

They're not in drugs to make money. Lots of kids buy some and sell enough to supply their own stash. They don't sell enough to make money," Walters said, and if they have any extra they might treat a friend.

Young persons are expected, he said, to study 1 to 18 years, to listen, to live in the often-easy environment provided by parents, to strive for goals that are those of their parents but which may not interest them. In such an atmosphere of waiting and preparation, those of the "do it now" generation feel they're parked, worthless, on a shelf.

"It's necessary for the people to feel they are somebody," Walters said.

DRUG CONTROL HERE SEEN IN 5 YEARS WITH ALL-OUT EFFORT

(By Carol Schatt)

"The effort to control drugs is just getting started in Phoenix," said Don Jackson, executive director of Community Organization for Drug Abuse Control (CODAC), at 1807 N. Central, Suite 114.

For the drug abuser or addict, CODAC hopes to offer full treatment and rehabilitation services, including:

Contact referral houses such as Terros House, where persons in trouble with drugs can come for help.

Emergency medical treatment and hospitalization.

Out-patient clinics for therapy and counseling.

Halfway houses where ex-addicts can live and help each other kick the habit.

Long-term rehabilitation center operated by professional medical personnel and ex-addicts to provide a proper environment for one- to two-year stays during which time an addict can be helped in reconstructing his personality.

Such facilities are expensive, Jackson said. CODAC hopes to establish two or three referral centers, seven or eight halfway houses and one long-term rehabilitation center.

Terros is one contact house operating and there are now two halfway houses, but doctors and hospitals find their hands tied by the lack of any rehabilitation facilities.

"Once they hit the street they go back to drugs," said one doctor. "There is no intensive follow-through to a cure."

Jackson said CODAC has spent $18,000 since its inception in June 1969 in getting Terros and the halfway houses—and CODAC general organization—under way.

"The expensive part is in the organizational phase, getting things operating," he said. "Maintaining the program doesn't cost nearly so much."

The $18,000 came from private donations by firms, associations and clubs, he said.

"Now we're looking for future funding in the hundreds of thousands of dollars."

They will come from the city, county and state and will be used as matching funds to bring in federal dollars, he said. And interest on all levels of government promises enough inducement to get those federal grants.

"In addition to seeking government funds, we're looking for local support and contributions from individual citizens and organizations," Jackson said.

CODAC's tentative budget is in the half-million dollar bracket, with the bulk provided through federal monies.

Federal grants, however, are diminishing; the government decreases such grants gradually over a period such as five years.

Where will CODAC get its funds when it has exhausted its federal checkbook?

"By that time we feel the community could and should support the program," Jackson said. "We'll have a program they can support. And if the community doesn't feel it is good enough or important enough, then the program probably is not worth having."

Among civic groups helping CODAC this year are Valley Kiwanis clubs. Kiwanis International has declared its main project for the year to be Operation Drug Alert, said Russell Williams.

"Locally," Williams said, "this means that each club will be spending time and money on educating parents as well as kids . . . What most clubs will be doing besides raising funds and contributing to CODAC is working through high school Key clubs."

Williams, area coordinator for Kiwanis' anti-drug program, said the 20 Maricopa County clubs will probably contribute $20,000 or more "to be spent one way or another" in the drug war.

"It was no selling effort at the clubs to get their support," he said. "The most difficult thing is to figure out how everyone can put their shoulder to the problem."

What about the future of CODAC and the drug problem?

"Unless an all-out effort is done now, I don't see any end to the drug problem in the foreseeable future," said Dr. Eugene Ryan. "By 'foreseeable future' I mean 5 to 10 years.

"However with the momentum gained by CODAC in the past six months and with the continued and increasing community support, I honestly believe we can control the drug problem in our community within five years.

"Hopefully, during this five-year period we will have action going in all directions, and, particularly, promote stringent action in regard to the pushers.

"We have to get legislative and judicial action to deal with these people."

"Now that we're getting recognized with more and more groups participating, we probably will be able to go to the legislature and also the judicial branches and get that across," Williams said.

Meanwhile, many observers see CODAC's greatest contribution as preventive education.

Parents of youngsters involved in drugs or those who want to know about drugs and communicate with their children are being invited to "parents anonymous" discussion groups now being formed. Interested parents may telephone CODAC at 252-7655.

BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, the gifted and gallant people of Byelorussia have shared the misfortunes of all other peoples of Eastern Europe. Being relatively less numerous—about 10 million—than their powerful neighbors, Byelorussians have been subjected to the oppressive rule of Russia's czarist autocracy and Communist tyranny. As a matter of fact their modern history is almost totally overshadowed by Russian history, because during nearly all that time their country—east of Poland and west of Moscow—was part of Russia's czarist empire. Thus for centuries Byelorussians suffered under the heavy Russian yoke. On their part the Russians did their best to assimilate these people by eradicating all Byelorussian national traits. But these sturdy descendants of their stouthearted forebears, always aware that they have had a longer history as a nation than the Russians themselves, were never willing to forgo and forget their distinct identity, were never reconciled with their lot under the Russian czars, and have always yearned for their freedom and independence. The opportunity for the attainment of their goal came in 1918.

The Russian Revolution of 1917 overthrew the decrepit and detested czarist autocracy in Russia, and freed, for the time, all subject peoples in the Russian empire. Freedom reigned from the Baltics to the Caucasus, and many national groups asserted their freedom by proclaiming their national independence. The Byelorussians did this on March 25, 1918, and established the Byelorussian National Republic. In a joyful and optimistic mood, it was then hoped that these ruthlessly oppressed people, having thus attained their independence in their historic homeland, would be allowed to enjoy their freedom in peace. Unfortunately that was not to be; they were destined to enjoy peace and freedom for only a short time, and then suffer even more under Soviet totalitarianism.

Early in 1921 aggressive Soviet forces attacked and overran Byelorussia, thus putting an end to the Byelorussian National Republic. Since then, for nearly 50 years, their homeland has become one of the constituent republics of the Soviet Union, and unhappy Byelorussians are unwilling toilers there, working largely for the benefit of the Russian rulers. These gallant people, however, have not given up their hope for their freedom, and even under the tyranny of communism they continue their struggle for liberty. It is my ardent wish to see the day when these fighters are freed from Communist totalitarian tyranny and enjoy the blessings of democracy in their own homeland.

DENIAL OF JETS TO ISRAEL CONDEMNED

HON. BENJAMIN S. ROSENTHAL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Mr. Speaker, the Nixon administration's refusal to sell Israel Phantom jet fighters is no contribution to world peace.

Not only will it jeopardize the future military planning of Israel so essential to keeping militant Arab States at bay; but it will also fan the aspirations of Arab fanatics and encourage their aggressive acts which could lead to the outbreak of a full-scale war.

We all know what a serious threat such an event would pose to the prospects for world peace. In addition, the Nixon administration seems willing to gamble Israel's very existence on the remote chance that withholding the Phantoms will appease the Arabs' bellicose tendencies.

When Richard Nixon was running for President, he urged the maintenance of Israel's overwhelming air superiority over the Arabs. Yet at a press conference 5 days ago, the President declared:

What we must understand in the Middle East is that when one side gets an enormous advantage over another, or a significant advantage, the danger of war coming escalates.

Not only has the President appeared to discard the concept that Israel's overwhelming military superiority is essential to prevent the eruption of full-scale hostilities; he also has suddenly coupled the Arab militants and the Israelis in the same breath when it comes to lust for revenge, desire for territorial expansion, and disdain for a negotiated settlement.

To make things worse, at the very time Washington was disclosing intentions to withhold weaponry from Israel, the Russians were busily sending military personnel and new sophisticated rockets into the United Arab Republic.

The President should show by actions and not words that our commitment to help preserve the sovereignty of Israel remains intact. Let him reverse his refusal to supply the Phantoms and thereby fulfill one of the promises on which he campaigned for the Presidency.

WALK FOR MANKIND

HON. BOB WILSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. BOB WILSON. Mr. Speaker, in our world today, we hear a great deal of talk, but not much action, about aiding the poor, the sick, and the downtrodden. I would like to pay tribute to a group of unselfish individuals who have put their words into action through dedicated service to their fellow men.

Project Concern is a San Diego-based, nonprofit organization which is providing desperately needed medical care in Mexico, Appalachia, Hong Kong, and South Vietnam. There is a pressing need for additional funds to enable Project Concern to continue and expand its humanitarian work, for Project Concern is completely dependent on public contributions for its support.

One of the most worthwhile and innovative fundraising projects initiated by Project Concern is their "walk for mankind." Through these "walks," young and old, rich and poor, are able to make a meaningful and personal contribution to serving others and I wholeheartedly endorse the unselfishness and devotion of the thousands of men and women who have participated in these "walks." I would like to share with my House colleagues the details of these "walks" which benefit this very deserving cause.

WALK FOR MANKIND

WHAT IS IT?

Walk for Mankind is Project Concern's newest national plan for involving schools, organizations and communities in a rewarding fund-raising effort to help the helpless—the sick of all ages who desperately need medical aid, food and basic sanitation. Operating without government subsidy and entirely dependent on public contributions, Dr. Jim Turpin has taken his organization, Project Concern, into neglected areas to help where the need is greatest. Funds to operate are needed. Walk for Mankind is an easy fund-raising project designed for Project Concern Committees, Jaycees, Women's Clubs, churches, schools and other organizations. Essentially, the project is a fun hike through the most interesting sections of your hometown!

CHALLENGE TO YOUTH

Walk for Mankind offers an exciting, challenging activity for the young people of your community. The Walk is primarily for them. It gives high school and college students a chance to become concerned about the less fortunate—a chance to protest against misery and sickness. There will be some hardy adults too, but most of the Walkers will be teenage students. Bands and banners, "way-out" costumes, free food and drink—all these make the Walk a great outing and colorful affair.

Here's the simple procedure. Each Walker is preregistered (usually at his school), given a Project Concern brochure or a locally developed flyer with information about Project Concern's intenational medical relief work, as well as instructions for the Walk, and Sponsor sheets. He then rounds up as many Sponsors as possible—family, friends, businesses, and others. He negotiates with each Sponsor for a certain sum per each mile walked. Naturally the higher the amount the better! Perhaps the Sponsor agrees to pay 10 cents—or maybe $10.00—for every mile completed of the established Route and verified by Walk Marshals at each checkpoint. After the Walk, each Walker is responsible for returning to all of his Sponsors, collecting the amount due, and depositing the total at a specific Bank or local Walk for Mankind office. Tax deductible receipts are given Sponsors upon request.

WHY WALK?

More than 200,000 ill—and often starving—children and adults will be helped through Project Concern this year in its six clinics and two rural hospitals in Hong Kong, South Vietnam, Mexico, and Appalachia, U.S.A. Dr. Turpin and 147 volunteer doctors, nurses, technicians and other staff work in physically depressed areas where the need is acute. Along with medical and dental aid, feeding programs provide children with soup or milk and vitamin-packed wafers ward off malnutrition.

A village self-help program in Tuyen Duc Province of South Vietnam trains local young men and women to give basic medical aid in their own villages.

Dr. Turpin's organization is made possible by the interest and good will of private citizens who care enough to send contributions personally or to help stage a fund-raising event. Walk for Mankind is an opportunity for those concerned about humanity.

HEADQUARTERS' ASSISTANCE

Walk for Mankind materials will be sent without cost to organizations planning a Walk. A Walk for Mankind manual with instructions, information kits for workers, publicity kits, Project Concern brochures and "Walk for Mankind" buttons will be provided by Project Concern. Other promotional materials such as posters, and a local flyer with Walk route, Sponsor sheet, et cetera, may be developed by the sponsoring group.

Responsible officers of interested organizations may write for free materials to the nearest office:

Project Concern International Headquarters, P.O. Box 2468, San Diego, Calif. 92112.

Project Concern Development Office, Stone-Brandel Center, 1439 So. Michigan Avenue, Chicago, Ill. 60605.

Project Concern Regional Office, 44 Linwood Ave., Ardmore, Pa. 19003.

Walk for Mankind, Santa Rosa, California, was the first American city to hold a Project Concern "Walk." Saturday, September 6, about 500 Santa Rosans led by Dr. Jim Turpin, public officials, and inspired by Sparky Schulz's "Peanuts" character, hiked over a 21 mile route in the picturesque Valley of the Moon area and earned $12,000.

SEADROME

HON. ROMAN C. PUCINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, with the ushering in of the 1970's, we truly find ourselves in a space age. Man's endless quest to reach the heavens has been partly satisfied with our conquering of the moon, reminding us of those immortal words of Robert Browning:

> Ah, but a man's reach should exceed > his grasp,
> Or what's a heaven for?

But back down on earth, man's immediate quest is to reach his destination faster and in the shortest period of time, which is by air. With more people traveling by air than ever before and with airplanes getting bigger, such as the newly unveiled Boeing 747 and a supersonic transport in the planning stage, our airports are congested and many are too out of date to accommodate more people and bigger airplanes.

It is obvious that we need larger and more modern airports, but this is a very expensive undertaking when we consider the cost of land, construction, noise, transportation and other related factors. One proposal that I consider highly feasible is to build new airports on water.

Mr. A. J. Harris, senior partner of the London consulting engineers firm of Harris & Sutherland, has outlined design considerations for a seadrome, an offshore floating airport, which would alleviate many of the problems of building an airport on land.

The article written by Mr. Harris is pellucid and his design outline for a seadrome seems most practicable for future new city airport locations. His ideas should be given the most serious consideration, and I highly recommend them to my colleagues.

Mr. Speaker, the article follows:

SEADROME

(By A. J. Harris)

Of the earth's surface, 73% is water. Many of the great cities are near the edge of open water.

As available space inland grows both expensive and remote, and as take-off and landing over houses becomes more and more objectionable, cities turn their eyes seaward and speculate whether they cannot find there the space they need for their airports. Already a number of airports have extended marginally over the sea on filling or piles—Hong Kong, Kingston Jamaica, La Guardia New York, Nice. What about taking the plunge and putting the airport afloat?

The idea is not new—ideas rarely are. The navies of both Britain and the USA tried it out in World War II, using various shapes of steel pontoon hinged together. Then there was the famous Habbakuk scheme for a floating staging post in mid-Atlantic, to be built of 'Pykrete', a mixture of water and sawdust frozen to form a sort of durable iceberg. But wars come to an end and civilian needs are different; it is only recently that the expansion of air transport has reopened the question.

That such a proposal has its problems needs little emphasis. Water is not for walking on—at least, not in the common run of affairs. On ordinary earth, we need a foot or so of concrete to spread the load of an aircraft; when the sustaining power is so much less, how much more structure shall we then need! Furthermore, it must be made to float. Whatever else happens to a floating airport, it may not sink. Seas can get rough; waves might break up the structure. Even if the structure resists, the waves might slosh over runways, rendering them unusable; the movement of the slab could be dangerous during landing and take-off.

Not all is loss, of course. Concrete as a material is always expanding and contracting slightly under the influences of temperature, moisture, loading and age; contraction predominates. When laid on the ground, these movements are restricted by friction between ground and concrete; either the concrete cannot expand and it buckles and bursts, or it cannot contract and thus crack and breaks into pieces.

These dangers are countered by splitting up a runway into a patchwork of small squares, with gaps between them filled by something black and sticky. The gaps are expensive to construct and require continual maintenance; a runway cut up in this manner is very much less strong than it would be if made of one piece. But a slab resting on water suffers no such restraint. It is completely free to expand and contract and the size of a single piece is in consequence not limited.

Again, while water is weaker than earth, its characteristics are at least the same everywhere and need no exploration to determine them—and there are no soft spots. Finally, water lies flat. Those extensive earth moving operations demanded at many airports to move hills and fill hollows have no parallel here.

TWO IDEAS

Our proposal incorporates two technical ideas:

The ability to form a floating slab of indefinite extent from separate elements precast on shore by prestressing them together, and

The ability to shelter the runway so formed from rough seas by a floating breakwater.

Let us take the runway first.

We all know how a shelf load of books can be picked up as a single unit after pressing in with a hand at each end. This is essentially prestressing—the inward push of the hands is a prestressing force holding the books together, and while the force is applied they act as a beam.

Imagine, then, that buoyant hollow slabs of concrete 100 ft. square are cast on shore. Ten of them are placed end to end, and high strength wires are fed through the whole length, tensioned up and anchored; we now have a strip 1000 ft. by 100 ft. held together as were the books. In practice, very high forces can be so applied, and the permanent compression created gives very high strength to the assembly.

A number of these strips may then be placed side by side, and again wires are passed through transverse holes, tensioned and anchored. We now have a large extent of concrete stressed together in two directions, made up from a number of identical square slabs. In fact, it is often inconvenient to have very long wires. The same effect is therefore obtained by shorter wires anchored at intermediary points with further lengths, overlapping with them or spliced to them, stressed in their turn. There is no limit to the size of floating slab that can be built up in this way.

The slabs themselves are rather like egg boxes made of concrete, with a top slab, a bottom slab and concrete partitions running in two directions parallel to the sides. Such a box will clearly float provided that water is kept out of the voids.

Now, properly made concrete is a watertight material for all practical purposes. Yet it is essential to ensure that the runway continues to float under any circumstances and after no matter what lapse of time. Even a remote possibility of slow seepage into the voids must be guarded against. Accordingly, they are filled with expanded polystyrene, a very light foamed material comprising a vast number of very tiny closed cells of plastic which permanently exclude water. This material has a further advantage: it can be fabricated beforehand to the exact shape of the void, and used as formwork for the concrete.

The capacity of a runway formed of such slabs to carry load can be predicted wfth some precision. In contrast, the support given to a slab on dry land by the ground beneath it is always a matter of doubt; the way ground deflects under load can vary enormously, and with any given ground the assumption that deflection is proportional to load is true only for very small deflections. With water we profit from one of the earliest of scientific observations, that of Archimedes, to the effect that the upthrust on a floating body is equal to the weight of water displaced. This is rigorously exact, whatever the depth of immersion, and provides the basis for a confident analysis of stress.

The behaviour of a prestressed assembly is of interest.

At a value of load where the tension caused by the load is greater than the compression caused by the wires, cracks will open at the bottom of the joints. Under bigger loads than this, deflections will increase rapidly; very large deflections will be needed to cause permanent damage to the slab. Removal of loads will result in cracks closing up and the structure returning to its original condition.

The slab is, in fact, calculated not to crack under any foreseeable combination of load and temperature difference, and its large deflection before rupture provides an attractive fail-safe feature.

The various techniques employed in this structure are familiar and well-tried; their use in harbour works has been common for the last 30 years. Only the application is novel.

THE BREAKWATER

In many places, sheltered water is available. It will consequently be enough to build the runways with no supplementary protection. A monolithic slab 15,000 ft.×1,000 ft. is a very stable object; it will also by definition be very strong, since it must support aircraft weighing, say, 1,000,000 lb. Quite minor expedients such as thickening the slab towards its edges, or adding a wave wall, will enable the runway to operate in moderate exposure such as exists at a large number of offshore sites.

But there will always be cities whose only airport site is the open sea, where the incident wave height must be reduced. Unless it is, storms may cause damage or—in less extreme weather—salt water flooding over the surface may make the runway unusable.

Floating breakwaters have a long history. I was engaged on them on the coast of France during the 1939–45 War, and witnessed both the brief success and final failure of our biggest attempt—it failed because the moorings broke. Most schemes have hitherto run into this difficulty because they sought to offer a vertical barrier to a wave.

Now if one is faced with a roaring drunken bully (a reasonable simile for a rough sea), one may punch him on the nose, though to do so requires careful calculation of the consequences. On the other hand, one may with advantage trip him up. The floating breakwater proposed here acts by tripping up the waves; instead of a vertical barrier, we have a horizontal barrier on which the waves break as if on a beach and spend themselves.

There is no sudden violence; the dissipation of energy is progressive along the breakwater, and mooring forces are small.

The performance of such a breakwater has a number of peculiarities. In the first place, the broader it is in the direction of the wave, the more effective; if it were very narrow, it would just ride the waves like a cork. In general, it continues to be of significant effect against a wave whose length is about twice the width of the breakwater, when it halves the height of the waves. For shorter waves than this, the performance is progressively better, until with wavelengths of half the breakwater width, hardly any wave action penetrates at all. Width, thus seen to be closely related to effectiveness, is also closely related to cost.

Measurements of mooring forces and bending stresses show that they reach a peak value near this upper limit of effectiveness; with longer waves, they diminish substantially. An automatic fail-safe behaviour is thus built in that transforms design.

Let us examine this. With a classic rigid breakwater, we must make it capable of resisting the worst conceivable conditions with an adequate factor of safety; it provides either complete protection always, or it collapses. But complete protection may not be necessary. A storm water sewer system is a parallel case. Sewers capable of taking the worst conceivable storm are not worth the cost and complexity of building them. It is accepted that roads get flooded momentarily and at rare intervals—the water then flows away and roads and sewers are left as they were before.

So it is with the floating breakwater. Exceptional waves pass through it, but the breakwater remains intact. With a breakwater of given characteristics, the number of days every year during which the facility protected by it is unserviceable may be estimated, and the loss of production set against the economy in breakwater cost. Clearly, complete protection may be obtained if it is desired; but if it is not, then the savings can be substantial.

When the breakwater is used to protect a floating runway, the particular circumstances need appraisal. In one location, the worst sea state may occur during a hurricane, when aircraft will be grounded anyhow; in another, a heavy sea may be caused by a storm hundreds of miles away even though the local weather is fine. The capital feature is that there is flexibility in design; it is not an all-or-nothing situation.

This, then, is the second of the basic technical ideas seen as necessary to the floating runway concept. The first, prestressing, is part of the standard practice of civil engineering; the floating breakwater is novel. During its development, it has been tested very extensively in different tanks at about 1/100th scale (assuming full scale to be big enough for effectiveness in the open ocean), including tests in a model of an actual harbour installation. It has also been tested at about 1/10th scale in the large wave-tank at the UK National Physical Laboratory, and a trial section of breakwater for less exposed conditions (which may be considered as being about 1/8th scale relative to the open ocean) has been in position and functioning for more than 18 months.

These tests have provided information on wave attenuation (discriminating between reflection and dissipation), movement of breakwater, and mooring forces for both wind and paddle generated waves. During the larger tests, bending stresses have been measured. The tests at different scales and in different tanks show very good agreement.

FURTHER AIRPORT REQUIREMENTS

There is, naturally, more to an airport than a runway. Let us look at some of the other factors.

Drainage

In principle, this presents no great problem—a hole in the runway is enough. It is conceivable that a pattern of closely-spaced holes would succeed in stopping rainwater from lying on the runway, thus avoiding the risk of hydroplaning. Such a measure would be highly convenient, and may one day be adopted. For the moment, classic crossfalls have been incorporated in the runway proper, draining away to a line of holes on each side.

Services

For service runs, the whole of the underside of the slab is available. A 'way-out' solution would doubtless provide for a regular pattern of sockets in the bottom surface, to which cable racks could be fixed; access would be by frogmen through manholes regularly spaced in the slab, and the services would be led up through holes broken out as need be.

It is, however, not necessary to be condemned to work underwater. In the first scheme a regular pattern of ducts is cast-in, passing through every cell in two directions and connecting up with main service trunks; all services can thereby be installed in the dry.

Navigational aids

The only apparent problem is with Category 3 landing approaches, for which the ILS aerials must be very accurately located relative to the floating pavement. This is not easy. But there are several possible solutions and the problem is not seen as insurmountable.

Terminal buildings

The load imposed by one large aircraft is about equivalent to the load of a moderately light-weight, three story building of some 50 ft × 50 ft in plan. Thus the runway structure itself can support extensive terminal accommodation.

Naturally, the raft cannot be treated entirely as though it were terra firma. It carries aircraft only because it spreads their weight over a wide area; attention must therefore be paid not only to the weight of building, but to its extent as well. Many facilities—for example, those for aircraft maintenance—will require special treatment and would probably need founding on special buoyant caissons. Not all of this is wasted expenditure, however. The buoyancy chambers constitute a basement that can be put to a useful purpose, such as for stores and workshops.

Access

There is no general solution to the access problem—it depends on the site. All means are open, from the most classic (the piled viaduct) to the most modern (the Hovercraft), either individually or in combination. Large rise and fall of tide will usually be an embarrassment, since it necessitates a long articulated span somewhere to accommodate the change in level. But the difficulties are minor.

Moorings

The forces on the runway are caused primarily by the drag of wind and current. Their total can be very substantial. There are two basic approaches to resisting these forces. In the first, the runway is held by a multiplicity of flexible cables each ending in its own anchor, which may be either just an anchor or alternatively a pile driven in the sea bed, or a large mass such as a sand filled caisson. In the second approach, a few very large supports are provided, such as large concrete caissons prestressed into the sea bed and supporting the runway rigidly through sliding joints or rockers.

The choice of solution will largely be dictated by such considerations as the depth of water and the nature of the bed.

FUTURE DEVELOPMENTS

The present scheme has been designed to satisfy the requirements of ICAO Annexe 14, certain of whose provisions invite reappraisal if they are to be applied to floating runways.

Perhaps the most important is that for clear space at runway level. This has been taken as a requirement to permit aircraft to run off the runway without danger, and structure capable of supporting an aircraft extending over the full clearance width has accordingly been provided in the scheme.

Such provision is expensive. It is noticeable that many runway extensions over water (New York, Hong Kong) where structure is costly do not, in fact, provide the full clearance width. We may expect that a rational statement on the needs of safety will allow some less expensive treatment of the areas alongside the runway, possibly incorporating devices either to decelerate aircraft or to direct them back onto the runway.

As far as the breakwater is concerned, work is now in hand to see whether it could be made monolithic with the runway structure. It would thus become a specially shaped fringe along the edge of the runway, and would benefit in performance from the enormous stability of the runway itself.

MANUFACTURE AND COSTS

The runway would be manufactured in 100 ft square elements in shelter on the coast. A sheltered beach would be ideal. The very large numbers to be cast, together with their general uniformity, would provide the opportunity for rationalised mass-production processes.

In a typical situation, a casting bed some 8000 ft long would be prepared at the top of a beach a few feet below high neap tide level, behind a bund wall. The casting bed would be divided into six sections each with 12 units; one section would be one day's work, and the whole six sections would be completed every week. Each section would be flooded separately at high tide, and the 12 units contained in it floated out through a collapsible gateway such as a butyl rubber bag filled with water. With this installation, the casting of a two-runway airport to international standards and comprising some 5 million square yards of pavement could be completed in 1.5–2 years.

A concreting machine developed from present-day paving equipment and spanning the full width of the section would run the length of the casting yard on rails, with a separate track for return. The machine would carry its own roof. The bottom slab would be cast, a prefabricated cage of reinforcing steel dropped on, the polystyrene blocks placed, and the webs and then the top flange cast in turn. The top surface would then receive its final non-skid finish.

On floating out, the elements would be moored near the foreshore, from where they would be towed away to the runway site. At the site, the first step would be to construct the necessary protecting breakwaters. Even if none are required for the final structure, a small mobile floating breakwater might well be of value as special protection during the actual assembly.

After the rafts have been floated into position they are seized by erection beams and held, the joints are made and allowed to set, and the tendons threaded through, tensioned, anchored and grouted up.

In considering economy, the significant figure is the cost per unit area of raft. This is the major item of special expenditure in a floating runway.

A detailed estimate of a specific project, that for the two-runway international airport at Foulness in the Thames Estuary, gives a cost per square yard of the structure alone, including drainage, of £10 12s 0d ($25.50). The moderately exposed site at Foulness needs protection by floating breakwater at a further cost of £2 4s ($5.30) per square yard. In a fully exposed site, this addition could be doubled or trebled. The total area at Foulness for runways, taxiways, hard standings and aprons is 5 million square yards, giving a structural cost of £64 million ($153.6 million).

The equivalent figure for a land based runway would have to cover the purchase of land, levelling and consolidation, the laying of the runway slab and its drainage. To these items must be added the more imponderable sums for convenience of access, noise nuisance, social amenity and many related factors, depending upon the location of the site in question.

NO MAD BOMBERS

HON. JOHN M. ASHBROOK

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, the March 23 issue of Barron's, the weekly organ of the business and financial world, carried a provocative article on the danger of subversion especially to the American businessman. As is noted in the article, Barron's has consistently publicized material on the various radical and extremist groups whose goal is the destruction of our constitutional system.

Periodically, articles by Mrs. Alice Widener, a syndicated columnist of long standing, have reported on the various activities of these elements. Now perhaps, with the burning of the Bank of America bank at Isla Vista, the business world will realize that the vast commercial system in our country is a prime target.

The article entitled "No Mad Bombers" outlines the program of destruction which has been taking place against the businessman in recent years and I insert it in the RECORD at this point:

NO MAD BOMBERS

To the handful of bankers who stand up to be counted (Barron's, March 16), albeit belatedly or reluctantly, add the names of Messrs. A. W. Clausen and Louis B. Lundborg, president and chairman of the board of directors, respectively, of the Bank of America. At the annual meeting of the largest commercial bank in the U.S. last week, both executives, in response to the sniping of a few dissident shareholders and to outside radical attacks, succeeded in taking a stand of sorts. Mr. Lundborg ruled out of order a resolution offered by a group of respectable peaceniks urging an immediate, total withdrawal of U.S. forces from South Vietnam. He also defended the bank's financial activities in that embattled land, and refused "positively" to consider shutting up shop in Saigon. Mr. Clausen, in turn, assailed the "pernicious propaganda" spread by "agitators" from Isla Vista, small community near the University of California campus and site of a Bank of America branch which "rampaging demonstrators—students and nonstudents"—burned to the ground late in February. At that time Bank of America, in full-page advertisements, broke the majority's silence on the issue of violence, which it urged all its countrymen, heedless of differences, to join hands in shunning. "We believe that at some time and in some place Americans must decide whether they intend to have their decisions, indeed their lives, ruled by a violent minority. We are but one bank, but we have decided to take our stand in Isla Vista."

Nothing like a burning branch to make one see the light. Or perhaps coercive picket lines flung around the homes of executives, demonstrations on company property and dynamite blasts at offices and plants will do just as well. If so, business and banking alike can scarcely fail to realize that they are under seige. Last spring, Barron's warned: "'Enlightened' or otherwise, capitalism has come under direct assault from a hit-and-run coalition of radical students and alienated members of minority groups who seek not to achieve higher wages, improved working conditions or more jobs, but . . . to shake the Establishment and ultimately bring it down. Scorning such bourgeois expedients as collective bargaining, they opt for tactics like infiltration, intimidation, boycott, sabotage and violence." Since then the plot, so to speak, has thickened. In one labor dispute after another, left-wing extremists have sought to forge an alliance between students and workers. To judge by what happened last week at the Bank of America and Hercules Powder—as well as by disclosures in the underground press of plans for a widespread campaign against "war profiteers" and "polluters"—the annual meeting, like the campus, is destined to become a battleground. Corporate headquarters, after a spate of recent bombings, already have wound up on the casualty list.

Along with the office equipment, furniture and files, the explosions should have shattered a few pervasive myths about the origins of revolution and the means needed to combat it. Communism is supposed to spring from misery and poverty, yet the most ruthless of the plotters emerge as daughters (and sons) of riches. "Workers of the world unite," cry Students for a Democratic Society (obscene misnomer); if they succeed, however, all power will be wielded by so-called intellectuals, who, from secure command posts deep in the groves of academe, push the buttons. Neither free enterprise nor freedom, finally, can long endure without learning how to protect itself. As Eastman Kodak and Ford, two early targets found out the hard way, corporate statesmanship and a social conscience are open invitations to trouble; IBM, showcase of enlightened capitalism, is still cleaning up the bomb-blasted rubble. Instead, commerce and industry should close ranks behind internal security legislation (now pending in the Senate Judiciary Committee) which would rebuild the nation's defenses against sedition and subversion. Full-page ads denouncing violence are all well and good as expressions of moral indignation and righteous wrath; amidst a clear and present danger, survival demands more.

The thrust at the corporate jugular takes many forms, some, at the outset at least, little more than harassment. Last week, for example, 30 young militants picketed headquarters of Hercules, Inc., handing out leaflets accusing the company, which supplies the military in Vietnam, of "war crimes." Radical "agitators" denounced the Bank of America as capitalist "profiteers," charges which the top executives indignantly denied. During the next six weeks or so, other strategic annual meetings throughout the country are targeted for demonstration, invective or worse. Here are the militants' marching orders, as disclosed in the latest issue of "New Mobilizer": "April is seen as the time to focus on the economic issues of the war around the theme 'Who Pays For the War? Who Profits From the War?' . . . In East Hartford, Conn., on April 14 we will bring publicity to bear on United Aircraft. In Seattle, Washington, on April 27 we will confront Boeing. . . . Plans for April 15 in Cleveland are moving ahead well. A lot of work has gone into demonstrations at the annual stockholders' meeting of AT&T to be held at the Public Auditorium in Cleveland on the 15th . . . Buffalo . . . A detailed scenario has been mapped out. Leafleting will take place at three local steel plants early in the week of April 15: Bethlehem, Republic and Allegheny-Ludlum . . . On April 28 we will be demonstrating at Gulf Oil in Pittsburgh and Honeywell, Inc., in Minneapolis . . . Honeywell, Inc., makes the anti-personnel fragmentation bomb, the most hideous weapon presently used against the Vietnamese."

Violent words, moreover, long ago escalated to deeds. In February of last year, hundreds of students from riot-torn San Francisco State College joined the picket line of refinery workers striking against Standard Oil Co. of California. In Seattle the University of Washington SDS pinned a United Fruit recruiter against a wall and forced him to watch a film purporting to depict his company's depredations in Latin America. In Washington, D.C., nine anti-war demonstrators broke into the offices of Dow Chemical Co., ransacked the files and splattered blood on the walls. At Ford Motor Co.'s assembly plant in Mahwah, N.J., a group of workers known as the United Black Brothers staged a wildcat strike, and, with SDS help, set up a picket line that temporarily disrupted production. During the prolonged shutdown at General Electric, a cause which SDS and its allies in the Progressive Labor Party promptly embraced as their own, student activities sought to run GE recruiters off college campuses at Michigan State, Princeton, Rutgers and the University of Chicago. "The revolutionary assault on American universities and industries," warned Representative William E. Brock (R., Tenn.) at the December Congress of the National Association of Manufacturers, "is a calculated attempt to weaken and eventually destroy private enterprise in America. Students for a Democratic Society and their allies are trying to forge a Marxist student-worker alliance which will create disruption in industry."

Violence inevitably has led to destruction of property, personal injury and death (which fate, with fine irony, so far has reserved for the radicals). Last August an explosive device with the force of 24 sticks of dynamite ripped through the Marine Midland Building in New York City, devastating the eighth floor and injuring 19; "It was a miracle," said one victim, "that nobody was killed." Others were hurt in mid-November, when bombs went off in the Chase Manhattan, General Motors and RCA Buildings. Two weeks ago bombs caused extensive damage in offices of General Telephone & Electronics, IBM, and Mobil, while an accidental detonation recently destroyed a bomb factory (and killed several activists) in a town house in Greenwich Village. Repeated bombings also have occurred in San Francisco, Seattle and Detroit.

The first explosions were something of a mystery—The New York Times even speculated that they might be the handiwork of some new Mad Bomber. Subsequent events soon disclosed the method in the madness. In November an anonymous letter to the newspapers, denouncing "the giant corporations," acknowledged the deed. This month a group which calls itself "Revolutionary Force 9" claimed the credit. "IBM, Mobile (sic) and GTE are enemies of all life," said the market communique. "All three profit not only from death in Vietnam, but also from American imperialism in the Third World. They profit from racist oppression, from the exploitation and degradation of employes forced into lives of antihuman work, from the pollution and destruction of our environment."

Beginning to get the picture? A closer look at those who have been arrested in connection with the bombings, or managed to blow themselves up, reveals a clear-cut pattern of left-wing extremism. Not that squalor is much in evidence—on the contrary, two of the victims found in the ruins of the Greenwich Village townhouse, as well as one of the survivors (whose father owned the $250,000 dwelling), come from wealthy families. They were graduates of "good" schools (notably Swarthmore and Bryn Mawr, which, on the basis of the fragmentary evidence to date, assay remarkably high in radicalism; Bryn Mawr last fall appoitned as Professor of Black Studies Herbert Aptheker, noted "theoretician" of the Communist Party, U.S.A.). Most of them had traveled to Cuba, rioted in Chicago or elsewhere and belonged to the "Weathermen" or some other ultra-violent wing of SDS, which J. Edgar Hoover, in the FBI Law Enforcement Bulletin for June 1969 has described as "rapidly gaining a definite Marxist-Leninist coloration."

Such disclosures seemed to astound both the so-called communications media and the public. They should have come as no surprise to readers of Barron's, who, thanks to the skill and courage of crusading journalists like Alice Widener, have long been alerted to the growing menace of the New Left and their Old Left mentors. Year-by-year Mrs. Widener, virtually single-handed, has covered the annual conferences of Socialist Scholars, at which blueprints for the radicalization of American college youth have been unveiled with increasingly open arrogance. At the first such affair (held, fittingly, at McMillin Theater, Columbia University, scene of bloody student riots several years later) Prof. Staughton Lynd, then of Yale University (and then and now associated with organizations cited by the U.S. Attorney-General as subversive), urged his fellow scholars to be ready at any time to put aside their books and go for "the jugular." "I wonder whether every teacher who calls himself a Socialist," he mused, "doesn't have the duty to become a professional revolutionary."

The Second Conference played host to a meeting of leaders of the Radical Education Project, an enterprise of SDS, which outlined a proposed "network of people in the U.S. and abroad who will serve the movement as quick, incisive sources of intelligence . . . such a network, including scholars, journalists, leftist youth leaders, government officials, guerrilla leaders etc. can provide us with first-hand reports of the action of insurgent movements, the workings of the foreign policy apparatus, impending developments. . . ." Guest of honor at the Third Conference was Owen Lattimore, whom the U.S. Senate Internal Security subcommittee has labeled "a conscious, articulate instrument of the Soviet conspiracy," while the Fourth, held at Rutgers in September 1968 featured an address by Ernest Mandel, Belgian Marxist and a chief strategist of the bloody French student revolts (for which he has been banned from France). Mandel advocated "mass strikes and mass movements," with students as the 'detonators in the formula for triggering a social explosion, creating a revolutionary situation."

Barred from the U.S. as well, he used blunter language in a taped message to a rapt audience in New York's Town Hall last fall: "As a revolutionary Marxist you must know that you cannot destroy capitalism piecemeal. You can abolish the structure only by overthrowing it." Yet The New York Times denounced his ban as the "blacklisting" of a distinguished person who only sought to participate in "academic discussions," while last week, it reported, "six American Scholars" (in point of fact, four of them Socialist Scholars) brought suit in federal court to restrain the Attorney-General from barring M. Mandel and keeping him from a scheduled "lecture tour."

Finally, at the Fifth Annual Conference, the Socialists dropped all pretense of scholarship. According to the official program, they plan the widespread reproduction and distribution of SSC papers in pamphlets "for assignment in the college classroom of materials written from an explicitly socialist perspective. . . ." As Mrs. Widener summed up (Barron's, September 15, 1969): "There you have it. Sure of immunity, the Socialist Scholars no longer need the 'convenience' of dissimulation concerning aims, methods and acts. They no longer need put on a false front of academic objectivity; they no longer need pretend that there is a separation between activities off-campus and on-campus, out-of-classroom and in-class."

Whence comes such immunity? Why, largely from the U.S. Supreme Court, which, under the influence of Earl Warren and his fellow-traveling associate, William O. Douglas (whose new book openly sanctions violent revolution) over the years has systematically gutted the nation's internal security laws. It would come to an abrupt end if Congress enacted various measures now in committee. One bill, supported by Rep. J. Herbert Burke (R., Fla.), would restore the power of the Secretary of State (stricken down by the High Court in 1967) to limit the travel of U.S. citizens to hostile countries, notably Cuba; Fidel Castro, charged the Congressman, "is operating a university of revolution in the hills of Pinar del Rio, where new left Americans receive training in bombing tactics and guerrilla warfare." A more comprehensive piece of legislation, currently in the Senate Judiciary Committee, would prohibit, without regard to the immediate effect thereof, the willful or knowing teaching or advocacy of the duty or need to overthrow by force or violence the government of the United States. If such statutes were passed and enforced few Socialist Scholars or SDS members would be walking around loose.

McCarthyism, some will cry, repression! We say that actions—notably dynamite bomb blasts—speak louder than words. The Preamble to the U.S. Constitution, following "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice," sets forth as the next high purpose "to insure domestic tranquility." Today no task is more compelling.

LET THERE BE LIGHT SHED ON THIS PLAN

HON. CRAIG HOSMER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, on February 24, 1970, I introduced with the cosponsorship of 11 colleagues H.R. 16139, providing for a study and trial period of year-round daylight saving time.

Joining me on this measure were Mr. CLEVELAND, Mr. FRIEDEL, Mr. GALLAGHER, Mr. GUDE, Mr. HELSTOSKI, Mr. LOWENSTEIN, Mr. MOORHEAD, Mr. OTTINGER, Mr. PETTIS, Mr. WHITEHURST, and Mr. HALPERN.

I am pleased to note that the initial public reaction to this bill has been extremely favorable. The Long Beach Independent, Press-Telegram on March 16 carried an editorial supporting the measure.

I am including this editorial in the RECORD with the hope that the Department of Transportation will promptly forward its comments on this measure.

LET THERE BE DAYLIGHT SHED ON THIS PLAN

Rep. Craig Hosmer (R.-Long Beach) and 10 other members of Congress have introduced a bill authorizing a preliminary study and trial period of year round daylight saving time throughout the country. We're inclined to go along with it.

The bill directs that the secretary of transportation conduct a three-month study of the feasibility and desirability of the proposal. If the results are favorable, a two-year trial period will ensue to assess its effects.

Among claims made in behalf of the proposal. The change would get the bulk of the nation's urban workers and shoppers home during daylight hours in winter. It would increase traffic safety during the evening rush hour. It would provide children a bit more after school playtime and it would reduce the incidence of street crimes.

Above all, it would end the twice yearly confusion and expense surrounding the time changes.

For these reasons—and because more than sufficient time is provided to determine if there are disadvantages—we think Congress should enact the measure.

MOVING THE MAIL

HON. FRANK T. BOW

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, the Wall Street Journal on Tuesday had some very sensible comments on the postal situation which I wish to include in the RECORD for the consideration of all who are concerned. The article follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Mar. 24, 1970]

MOVING THE MAIL

The first priority in the current mail strike is to get the mail moving. President Nixon recognized as much yesterday when he ordered military personnel to handle essential mail in New York City, where the tie-up started and where the Post Office was still shut down.

At the same time Mr. Nixon stressed that the "overwhelming majority" of postal employes had refused to join the illegal walkout and instead were carrying out their responsibilities. To these workers, as well as to those on strike, he promised full discussions of all grievances—but not while thousands remain off their jobs.

As the President conceded, the economic problems of postal workers in some cases are severe. Still, those problems should be kept in perspective.

The top pay of letter carriers, $8,442, obviously is not high in these inflated times. Perhaps it's worth remembering, though, that the median income for all U.S. families is only about $8,000. Whatever the problems of the postmen, in other words, around half of all Americans are worse off.

Federal employes, moreover, have a degree of job security seldom attainable in private employment. This security is especially great in the Post Office, where the chief change over the years has been a growing demand for service—and personnel.

The real problems the postmen do have run much deeper than money. Ironically, most of the postal workers' unions have been fighting tooth and nail to preserve the politics-ridden system that is mainly responsible for their members' troubles.

Some critics claim the Administration precipitated the mail crisis by tying a postal pay raise to sensible postal reform. If the Administration did in fact link the two, it was showing much more compassion for the workers' real grievances than their leaders were.

It is, for one thing, perfectly clear that $8,442 is a lot more money in some parts of the nation than it is in others. But Congress, setting postal wages largely for political reasons, hasn't been inclined to fix higher wages for one member's constituents than for others.

A semi-independent postal authority, of the sort the Administration proposes, would be flexible enough to take living costs into account. At the same time, of course, it could shear away the political appointees who still occupy many top postal positions, and thus leave many career postal workers stuck in dead-end jobs.

If the postal unions really wanted to help their members, all of them would have been working hard for reform. An $8,442 wage wouldn't look discouraging anywhere if an ambitious postal worker knew that it did not need to be the end of the road.

However serious the problems of any of the workers, they do not justify illegal strikes. The fact that the strikes started in New York is unsurprising; postal workers there have watched while other public employes pulled illegal walkouts—and usually wound up being rewarded with higher pay.

New York has long been known as a "good" labor town, meaning one where the politicians generally knuckle under to the unions. At the state level this shows up in the fact that New York actually pays unemployment benefits to workers who go out on strike. Since the benefits are financed by employers, the companies thus subsidize strikes against themselves.

The Federal Government simply cannot permit itself to get in that sort of predicament. If the postal strikers get away with this power play, there are many other Federal workers only too likely to follow the leaders.

What is at issue, as President Nixon said, is survival of a Government based upon law. If the strikers begin to see that is so, there will be no need for the President to order troops into cities other than New York. He made it clear, though, that he would not hesitate to take whatever steps become necessary.

It was the sort of decision no political leader enjoys making. The postal strikers, however, left a President of the United States no other choice.

NOMINATION OF JUDGE CARSWELL SHOULD BE REJECTED

HON. WILLIAM F. RYAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, today's Washington Post carried a letter by Dagmar S. Hamilton, instructor in government, University of Texas, about the nomination of Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court. Miss Hamilton's letter, which I append at the end of this statement, raises what I think is the real core of the issue before the other body—can responsible action on its part gibe with approval of this nomination?

The Constitution makes clear the Senate's responsibility. Article II, section 2, clause 2 provides:

> The President . . . shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate shall appoint . . . Judges of the Supreme Court. . . .

Two words stand out—they were capitalized by the framers themselves: advice and consent. The duty of the Senate is two-fold, then. It must render or withhold its consent to the nomination which the President makes. And—and notice that this world comes before "consent"—it must tender its "advice." This advice is the real crux of the responsibility at issue here.

The Senate is obliged by the Constitution to advise the President; rubberstamp consents will not do. What are the considerations which should be taken up in rendering this advice? First, there is the question of the person who has been nominated—what does he stand for; what has he stood for? Second, there is the nominee's likelihood of being a contribution to the highest tribunal. Third, there is the nominee's impact on the social fabric of society—does his placement on the Supreme Court signal rejection of some groups or some people?

When we look to Judge Carswell's record of accomplishment off the bench, we see a man who has not just once, but in several instances, espoused views totally at odds with morality, with the 14th amendment of the Constitution, and with the forward progress of those who seek equality and justice for all.

We all know, by now, of Judge Carswell's 1948 statement—made before he became a judicial officer, but when he was already a mature man of 28—that "segregation of the races is proper and the only correct way of life in our States."

In 1956, then U.S. Attorney Carswell joined others in arranging to convert the Tallahassee public golf course into a private club. Affidavits from black and white citizens affirm that this private country club arrangement was commonly known to be a ruse to evade compliance with the Supreme Court's rulings. Thus, Judge Carswell's disclaimer of any knowledge that a discriminatory intent lay behind his actions is hard to accept. It is even more so in light of the fact that U.S. Attorney Carswell was then a Federal officer, responsible for knowing the developing law of the day.

Thus, as a private citizen, G. Harrold Carswell has espoused views which are alien to the premises on which this Nation was founded.

As a judge, Judge Carswell stands as a man unsuited to be placed on the Supreme Court. Men who have achieved the highest eminence in the legal profession have said that his judicial career has been mediocre:

Prof. William Van Alstyne, a supporter of Judge Haynsworth's nomination, testified that Judge Carswell shows no promise of ability or judicial capacity—

> To warrant any expectation whatever that he could serve with distinction on the Supreme Court of the United States.

Dean Louis Pollak of Yale testified that Judge Carswell:

> Has not demonstrated the professional skills and the larger constitutional wisdom which fits a lawyer for elevation to our highest court. . . . With all deference, I am impelled to conclude that the nominee presents more slender credentials than any nominee for the Supreme Court put forth this century.

Dean Derek Bok of Harvard has written that Judge Carswell has:

> A level of competence well below the high standards that one would presumably consider appropriate and necessary for service on the Court.

Professor Charles L. Black, Jr. of the Yale Law School has written:

> (T)here can hardly be any pretense that he [Carswell] possesses any outstanding talent at all. On the contrary, all the evidence I have seen would lead to the conclusion that mediocrity is an independent valid objection to his appointment.

Twenty members of the University of Pennsylvania Law School concluded "that he is an undistinguished member of his profession, lacking claim to intellectual stature." Nineteen members of the faculty of the University of Virginia School of Law concluded that Judge Carswell is a "judge whose legal abilities and judicial background are so sadly wanting." The list of names of law professors throughout the country would run on for hundreds if all those who have publicly expressed their rejection of Judge Carswell were published here.

And this rejection is not limited to professors. Lawyers throughout the country have as well expressed their view of Judge Carswell's lack of competence to serve on the Supreme Court. Among them, I would note, are Bruce Bromley, former judge, court of appeals, State of New York; Francis T. P. Plimpton, president, the Association of the Bar of the City of New York; Judge Samuel I. Rosenman, former president, the Association of the Bar of the City of New York; and Bethuel M. Webster, also a former president of the association.

The Ripon Society has made a comprehensive study of Judge Carswell's 11 years as a district judge. Using five relevant criteria—reversals on appeal, reversals in general, citation by other courts, elaboration of opinions, and use of authority—the Ripon Society concluded that "they form a most impressive indictment of Judge Carswell's judicial competence." Their report states:

> 1. Reversals on Appeal: During the eleven years (1958–1969) in which Judge Carswell sat on the federal district court in Tallahassee, 58.8% of all of those cases where he wrote printed opinions (as reported by West) and which were appealed resulted ultimately in reversals by higher courts. By contrast in a random sample of 400 district court opinions the average rate of reversals among all federal district judges during the same time period was 20.2% of all printed opinions on appeal. In a random sample of 100 district court cases from the Fifth Circuit during the 1958–1969 time period the average rate of reversals was 24.0% of all printed opinions on appeal.
> 2. Reversals in General: Carswell's rate of reversals for all of his printed cases was 11.9% as compared to a rate of 5.3% for all federal district cases and 6% for all district cases within the Fifth Circuit during the same time period.
> The majority of cases before any federal district judge ordinarily do not result in appeals, hence precluding the possibility of reversals in those cases. It is significant however, that Carswell's overall reversal record for his printed cases is more than twice the average for federal district judges. When additional unprinted opinions are included, Carswell is found to have an overall reversal rate of 21.6%.
> 3. Citation by Others: Carswell's 84 printed opinions while he was serving as a district court judge were cited significantly less often by all other U.S. judges than is the average for the opinions of federal district judges. Carswell's first 42 opinions during his first five years on the federal judiciary (1958–1963) have been cited an average of 1.8 times per opinion. Two hundred opinions of other district judges randomly chosen from district court cases spanning this same time period have been cited an average of 3.75 times per opinion. The 42 most recent of Carswell's printed district court opinions have been cited an average of 0.77 times per opinion.

Two hundred opinions of other district judges randomly chosen from cases spanning the same 1964–1969 time period have been cited an average of 1.57 times per opinion.

4. Elaboration of opinions: Carswell's printed district court opinions average 2.0 pages. The average length of printed opinions for all federal district judges during the time period in which Carswell sat on the district bench was 4.2 pages.

5. Use of authority: In the 84 above-mentioned Carswell opinions the average number of citations of cases is 4.07 per opinion, and the average number of citations of secondary source material is 0.49 per opinion. The average for all district judges during the 1958–1968 time period was 9.93 case citations per opinion and 1.56 citations of secondary source material per opinion.

Judge Carswell's lack of judicial distinction is sufficient reason for rejection of his nomination.

Perhaps an even greater indictment against him lies in his antipathy toward civil rights. Numerous attorneys have attested to the judge's hostility toward them and their clients—a hostility clearly showing a lack of the impartial temperament required of every judicial officer. Prof. Leroy Clark of New York University, who supervised the NAACP Legal Defense Fund litigation in Florida between 1962 and 1968, called Judge Carswell:

(T)he most hostile federal district court judge I have ever appeared before with respect to civil rights matters. . . . Judge Carswell was insulting and hostile. I have been in Judge Carswell's court on at least one occasion in which he turned his chair away from me when I was arguing. I have said for publication, and I repeat it here, that it is not, it was not an infrequent experience for Judge Carswell to deliberately disrupt your argument and cut across you, while according, by the way, to opposing counsel every courtesy possible.

It was not unusual for Judge Carswell to shout at a black lawyer who appeared before him while using a civil tone to opposing counsel.

Prof. John Lowenthal of Rutgers University Law School recalled attending a session in Judge Carswell's chambers in 1964 in which he—

Can only describe his [Judge Carswell's] attitude as being extremely hostile.

He expressed dislike at Northern lawyers . . . appearing in Florida, because . . . (they) were not members of the Florida bar.

Norman Knopf, a Justice Department attorney, who had worked with Professor Lowenthal in 1964, corroborated Professor Lowenthal's recollections:

Judge Carswell made clear, when he found out that he was a northern volunteer and that there were some northern volunteers down, that he did not approve of any of this voter registration going on. . . . It was a long strict lecture about northern lawyers coming down and not members of the Florida Bar and meddling down here and arousing the local people, and he in effect didn't want any part of this, and he made quite clear that he was going to deny all relief that we requested.

Finally, Judge Carswell's decisions show full well his antipathy toward civil rights. Delay, failure to follow controlling precedent, and hostiity mark his decisions. To cite just one example:

On April 22, 1963, Judge Carswell ordered a grade-a-year elimination of dual attendance zones in Steele v. Board of Public Instruction of Leon County, 8 RACE REL. L. REP. 934. On three separate occasions in 1965, he denied plaintiffs' motions for changes in this pace. 10 RACE REL. L. REP. 607. Yet, on February 24, 1965, months before Judge Carswell denied these motions, the Fifth Circuit outlawed grade-a-year plans in the circuit in Lockett v. Board of Education of Muscogee County School District, Ga., 342 F. 2d 225 (5th Cir. 1965).

Mr. Speaker, Judge Carswell's record as a judge leaves little doubt that in terms of temperament, intellect, ability, and prejudice, he is unsuited to sit on the Supreme Court.

Finally, one must look at how confirmation of his nomination would affect the social fabric of our society. In view of Judge Carswell's racial prejudice, in view of his actions as a private citizen to actualize this prejudice, and in view of his judicial actions giving governmental imprimatur to this prejudice, I think there can be only one conclusion: Judge Carswell's nomination is an outright, unabashed insult to the 20 million black citizens in this country. And it is equally an offense to those whites who believe in, and will struggle for, equal rights and equal justice for all men.

Confirmation of this nomination would constitute senatorial signature to this outrage. It would endorse the regression which this administration has encouraged by its posture toward school desegregation. I, for one, hope my colleagues in the other body will do better. I believe that they cannot afford to do any less.

The letter of Dagmar S. Hamilton, instructor in government at the University of Texas, follows:

[From the Washington Post, March 24 1970]

JUDGE CARSWELL'S NOMINATION

Every spring, in a beginning government class my students discuss the theory of checks and balances in the American system. This year, it has been very difficult to explain that the Constitution aparently does not mean what it says, when it liimts the presidential "power to appoint . . . justices of the Supreme Court" by adding, "subject to the advice and consent of the Senate."

The students are disposed to take this qualification literally (strict constructionists) and to believe that the Founders meant that the Senate has the duty (not just the right) to reject nominees it finds unqualified. They do not think that it means the Senate should be a rubber stamp; they see nothing to indicate that if the Senate rejects a president's nominee, it must as a matter of courtesy accept the second time around. They argue that it would not be much of a check if a president could (simply by pulling identical substitutes out of a hat) eventually nominate the sort of person the Senate first rejected.

When a president's second selection is, as many senators will privately admit, "worse than the first," students find it even more difficult not to be cynical about the whole system. They know that Carswell is worse than Haynsworth in terms of his legal competence (reversed frequently, described as the weakest nominee of the century by the Dean of Yale Law School, criticized sharply by a majority of people teaching in his field). And they know that Carswell's judicial philosophy is worse, in the sense that it ignores both the spirit of the 14th Amendment and the basic premise that "the Constitution is colorblind."

Having learned also that the Framers intended the Court to be above partisan politics (e.g. lifetime appointments), students think it an insult to the Court even to insinuate that it should respond to the silent majority. They know that the Court needs men who are responsible—not necessarily to a fickle majority—but to the highest principles and ideals of the rule of law.

In the matter of Carswell, if any Senator abdicates his responsibility to vote his conscience, in favor of expediently going along with the President then he—that Senator—must be responsible for the failure of our system of checks and balances; not the disillusioned students, and not that small group of dissidents who attack the system for the most part much less effectively.

DAGMAR S. HAMILTON.

A NATION'S CONCERN FOR ITS MILITARY WIDOWS

HON. CRAIG HOSMER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, the sad plight of widows of career military personnel is attracting nationwide attention, evidenced by several bills introduced in this body. It is a tragic oversight on the part of the Congress that these women today are largely ignored on the matter of annuities.

Why, people are asking, is the widow of a retired military careerman not entitled to a pension as are the widows of civilian Federal retirees?

To correct this gross inequity, Mr. GUBSER has introduced H.R. 6226, which is now pending before the Committee on Armed Services. Last year, I introduced H.R. 2087, which would accomplish essentially the same objectives.

One of the leading editorial columnists of the Long Beach Independent Press-Telegram, Mr. Larry Collins, Sr., has written an excellent article on this problem, urging immediate congressional action. He indicates that H.R. 6226 has wide support within the Armed Services Committee, including the distinguished chairman.

I am hopeful that the Department of Defense can promptly make its views known on this matter so that the Congress may proceed forthwith.

I am including Mr. Collins' fine article in the RECORD:

MILITARY WIDOWS LEFT WITHOUT PENSIONS

(By L. A. Collins, Sr.)

About the only widow today who is left without a portion of the pension the husband had received is the widow of a retired military career man. The widow of a man receiving Social Security is entitled to a portion of the husband's pension. But the widow of a retired career service man finds her husband's pension cut off at the time of his death.

Former National President of the Fleet Reserve Association, Bernard P. O'Hare of Long Beach tells of efforts to have this inequity changed by Congress. In my opinion it is an issue that each of us should support in fairness to the wives who have been associated with our military forces.

It would be realistic if each local retired member of our military forces wrote to his congressman urging a vote in favor of the bill referred to in the following outline of the problem. It would also be helpful if they wrote to the congressmen from the area which was their former home. Mr. O'Hare outlines the issue as follows:

The widow of a military retiree is the victim of a cruel inequity which exists today. She is the only widow of a federal retiree who dose not receive an annuity based on her husband's retired pay. The widow of a civilian federal retiree can receive an annuity equal to 55 per cent of the retired pay her husband was receiving at the time of his death.

Contrary to common belief, the military widow receives no money from the Service in which her husband served. If her husband was a veteran, the Veterans Administration will, under certain conditions, pay her a widows pension ranging from $17 to $74 a month. However, the widow of every veteran is entitled to such a pension. To be a veteran, a person must have served on active duty for a minimum of 90 days and be honorably discharged. There are no special provisions for career servicemen.

The military retiree does have a survivors benefit program available to him. It is entitled the Retired Serviceman's Family Protection Plan (RSFPP). It is an actuarially sound program and receives no government financing. The participants pay the total costs of the program. For example, a retired chief petty officer (E–7) with 20 years of active service may contribute $13.77 monthly from his military retired pay and in the event of his death his widow will receive $83.75 a month.

Under federal law the civilian federal retiree in a comparable pay grade pays only $5.92 a month and his widow will receive $130.50 a month.

The federal government pays almost 80 per cent of his survivor's annuity cost. It is because of this gross difference and other restrictive provisions that less than 15 per cent of all military retirees participate in RSFPP. Yet, more than ninety per cent of all civilian federal retirees participate in their survivors benefit program.

The fleet reserve Association, an organization of more than 75,000 career sailors and marines, has launched an intensive legislative program to correct this inequity. The association has conducted a comprehensive, eighteen-month study of survivor benefit programs offered to employes of the government and private enterprise. This study has been published in the revealing 64-page pamphlet entitled, "Widow's Equity."

The FRA drafted corrective legislation which provides for military retirees to receive the same survivor benefits that are offered to civilian federal retirees. Representative Charles S. Gubser, of California's Tenth Congressional District, introduced the legislation, H.R. 6226, on February 5, 1969. H.R. 6226 is now before the House Committee on Armed Services and the committee has been patiently awaiting the Department of Defense's position on the measure. The principle of the bill is widely supported by members of the House, including Chairman L. Mendel Rivers.

Each day more military retiree wives join the rolls of widows. The majority of these widows are in their senior years and in dire financial need. They are too proud to accept charity as they have always earned their keep through faithful service to their nation. They do not understand why they are denied the fruit of their husband's dedicated and self-sacrificing labors; nor do we!

Under the provisions of H.R. 6226 they will receive no more than what the widows of federal civilian retirees are receiving. Benefits they should be receiving now! H.R. 6226 should be enacted into law immediately.

NEW SMITHSONIAN MAGAZINE

HON. JAMES G. FULTON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. FULTON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the announcement of the sending of the new Smithsonian magazine.

We strong supporters of the Smithsonian Institution welcome this fine new venture and will participate heartily for its success.

I am sure this fine article from the Washington Evening Star, Monday, March 23, 1970, by Herman Schaden will be of interest to my colleagues and to the American people:

"SMITHSONIAN" MAKES DEBUT

(By Herman Schaden)

The Smithsonian has a new baby measuring 8¼ by 11 inches and weighing 7 ounces—tiny as human infants go, but quite a bundle if it is your first national magazine.

Wrapped between covers of two courting elephants and a book ad, the youngster is off to homes from coast to coast christened simply "Smithsonian" by parents who can't resist bragging about its sparkling four-color pictures and 76 pages of articles and advertisements.

Godfather S. Dillon Ripley, who long envisioned the magazine as an inducement for millions to join the national Smithsonian Associates, greeted the newcomer enthusiastically.

"He was ecstatic," one editor said of the Smithsonian secretary. "I hope he hasn't cooled off."

General Manager Joseph Bonsignore also was happy with the product and the way it is being accepted by subscribers and advertisers. Editor Edward K. Thompson, formerly of Life magazine, expressed pleasure with the first edition but said it "did not necessarily set a pattern for future issues."

PACKAGE DEAL

The publication is being offered as one of the benefits of being a Smithsonian Associate. The package deal gives members special privileges in connection with Smithsonian museums. There are no newsstand sales.

No figures were released on current circulation, but Bonsignore said it "well exceeded the 175,000 minimum guaranteed to advertisers." The Smithsonian is determined to make the magazine self-sustaining through membership and advertising revenues.

Bonsignore is proud that production is almost totally a Washington area enterprise. For instance, the color separations are by Lanman Co. of Alexandria, whose subsidiary, Lanman Lithoplate of Washington, does the stripping and page filming. Type for the articles is set by Harlowe Typography of Washington; the offset proofwork is by Fawcett-Haynes Printing Co. of Rockville, and the high-grade paper is supplied through Parsons Paper Co. of Washington.

Volume 1, Number 1 is about 75 percent textual, 25 percent advertising. Technically it is a superb product—with clear, easy-to-read type, lustrous color illustrations, and skillful layout and art work.

Ripley sums up the need for the magazine in his opening comments: "Even in the 'now' generation, when history has lost its dates, art its roots, when sleep research shows up the absolute necessity of the non-intellective experience, and the new mode is a kind of abstract existentialism, man's thirst for knowledge continues unabated."

STARFISH, BLACK STUDIES

The cover story is by the National Zoo's resident scientist, John Eisenberg. It is a richly illustrated report from Ceylon on the courtship and mating habits of elephants and a survey of their ecology.

Rene Dubos writes on "Life, An Endless Give and Take with Earth and All Her Creatures." Among other features are a story on how starfish are destroying Pacific coral atolls, an examination of black studies and paintings illustrating the Metropolitan Museum of Art's centennial.

Russell Lynes writes on "The Met as Mother Hen." Frank Sartwell visits a laboratory in which crowded mice evoke images of overcrowded man. The scope of subjects is representative of the magazine's aim to cover the sciences, arts, and humanities with emphasis on current problems of the environment.

PRESIDENT NIXON'S EDUCATION REFORM MESSAGE

HON. JOHN BRADEMAS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 25, 1970

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, President Nixon's education message of March 3, 1970, challenged the theory and effectiveness of school aid programs funded under title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

In a letter to the Washington Post, Roger A. Freeman, Special Assistant to the President, expanded on the President's message.

On March 15, 1970, the Washington Post printed Mr. Freeman's letter, as well as an article by Douglass Cater, former Assistant to President Johnson, and an editorial dealing with ESEA title I.

I insert these articles in the RECORD:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 15, 1970]

BACK TO A STALEMATE IN EDUCATION?

(By Douglass Cater)

(NOTE.—Cater was a special assistant to President Johnson and worked on the Johnson education programs.)

A few days ago, the Lockheed Corporation was reported to be in serious financial trouble. Promptly, Deputy Defense Secretary Packard hastened to Congress to explore ways to bail out this great manufacturer of aircraft and missiles. Regularly, we learn of cost overrides in the defense industry totaling billions of dollars. Tanks, planes and missiles not only cost much more than estimated but perform below expectations. Our defense policy is to grimace and bear it, recognizing that weapons production is a complicated business.

To educate a child is more complicated than to construct a plane or missile, especially if that child suffers from the ugly blight euphemistically called "disadvantage."

Yet, President Nixon means to apply the policy of a prudent investor in education. "As we get more education for the dollar, we will ask Congress to supply more dollars for education," he has declared in his Message on Education Reform earlier this month. Knowing why education works and what makes it fail, he argues, must "precede" any rational attempt to provide every student with the best possible education.

Lockheed would go bankrupt if such a policy were applied to defense. It may have less dramatic but no less destructive impact on the national education. For the Nixon budget makes explicit what his message only hints at: The federal commitment to education is being reduced. Support for higher education has received an even more severe cutback than the elementary and secondary programs. I find it hard not to conclude that Nixon policy is designed to achieve the stalemate that was the longtime condition of federal aid to education.

It may be useful to review the federal role and how we got where we are today. Since 1946, at least a dozen presidential commissions have called urgently for federal aid to education. These included the one appointed by President Eisenhower in 1954 and headed by Neil McElroy, who is now being summoned to study the subject still another time. As a result, beginnings were made in higher education. Yet, there were roadblocks to federal assistance at the lower level—segregation, church-state separation, distribution formulas—which produced 20 years of stalemate.

Finally, Congress cleared away or bypassed the roadblocks. A successful formula was worked out assigning first priority to the needs of the disadvantaged student. This formula became Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965—a major breakthrough.

There was abundant evidence that ESEA not only was good politics; it was good policy. Over the past two decades, there has been an explosion in the nation's education system. Middle-class America was moving to the suburbs and spending great sums for new school plants, teachers, etc. Overall statistics reveal this growth. But it doesn't take a statistician to measure what has been happening to the metropolitan school systems as well as to many rural ones. Most have been caught in a desperate budget squeeze.

HAS TITLE I FAILED?

Can anyone dispute the logic of ESEA's Title I that disadvantaged students have a severe impact on schools? The sad question, as we witness the desperate floundering of city school systems where the influx of disadvantaged students has been heaviest, is why government did not anticipate this impact 20 years earlier and help the schools prepare for it.

Has Title I failed? Commissioner Allen points out that many school systems have diverted Title I funds to other purposes. This is grevious folly on their part and points to a lack of controls in the federal system. It won't be corrected by President Nixon's promise of revenue sharing with the states.

President Nixon's aides have cited the Coleman Report to prove that the size of classes don't have a measurable effect on learning achievement. They come precariously close to arguing that dollars don't make a difference in education.

To anyone who has watched a child in school, the Coleman findings are not that surprising. While learning cannot be measured by student-teacher ratio, learning does depend on student-teacher relations. Even in the age of technology, the best kind of education may still be "Mark Hopkins on one end of a log and a student on the other." You can't buy inspired teachers like Mark Hopkins with dollars alone. But it takes dollars to expand the Teacher Corps and other programs which offer incentives to attract our best teachers to the hardship posts in education.

Prof. Coleman and others have rightly pointed to the need for basic reforms in the public school systems. But I doubt very much that they meant their words to be seized by the politicians to justify stalemate on federal aid to education. Coleman, for example, calls for increased action to break down de facto segregation as the best way to achieve equal educational opportunity. To have the remotest chance of success, this will cost a great many more dollars.

President Nixon's aides mention numerous failures and few sucesses in programs of compensatory education. They claim that these programs have not paid off in improved reading norms. Even if this were a fair summary, what does it prove? What would have happened to reading norms in New York or Washington if there had been no attempt to cope with the disadvantaged students crowding into the schools? Perhaps it was an achievement merely to prevent total collapse of the public school system.

But the fact is that there have been notable breakthroughs. The Nixon aides fail to mention the latest Hawkbridge study which cites some of the success stories of Title I. The Kingsbury Center here in Washington has pioneered in overcoming severe learning disabilities, including those of children from the black ghetto. Operating costs run about $3,500 per student. A fearful cost. Almost as much as it costs to keep a youngster in a reformatory or a mental institution.

We need to know more. That is why President Johnson's first education message in 1965 put such heavy stress on research. Congress multiplied many times the budget for research in the Office of Education. Regional education laboratories have been established in leading universities. But President Nixon is right in saying we need more and better research. I support his proposal to create a National Institute of Education.

But research alone can never provide the answer. It is faulty to use the analogy of the National Institutes of Health. We cannot expect to discover miracle drugs to cure learning disability as we hope to cure cancer. We can't innoculate a kid against ignorance. Our chief frustration today is in transforming what we already know into effective action. It is going to take trial and error, success and failure. To open the mind of a child, especially one scarred by his life outside the classroom, is an independent miracle each time it happens.

Can we prove compensatory education will pay off? Of course not! Can President Nixon prove that putting a $1,600 floor under income will enable a family to break out of the rut of poverty? Of course he can't! Conceivably, it could lead to an inflation of the ghetto economy that would quickly soak up all the benefits. It may take a floor of $6,000 or $8,000 to have a measurable impact in a city like New York, just as it may cost much more than was anticipated to make New York's education programs succeed. But this is no reason to delay the new commitment to welfare. The alternative of standing still is unbearable.

Education, like welfare, is a dynamic enterprise in America. It can't be made to lie dormant while waiting for reform several years in the future. To cripple the momentum of our nation's commitment to equal education opportunity is a greater gamble than to delay spending billions of dollars on the ABM. For the dangers of the education gap are more clearly demonstrable.

In the struggle over priorities in the federal budget, education has great disadvantage in competing against defense programs. Education has to fight harder for its claim on the federal dollar. If the President tries to whittle away the education budget, if he fails to set clear and purposeful priorities, this fight for dollars could turn into a bitter struggle among vested interest groups. For example, the programs for federally impacted areas, though grossly inequitable, will claim a lion's share no matter what the President says. Strong interest groups will rally selfishly around tax credits for tuition, costing billions in federal revenue and mainly benefitting the higher income families.

While this savage struggle goes on, the programs to bring equal opportunity could die of neglect, and a great national commitment be forgotten. The Nixon message and the Nixon budget seek to freeze these programs until there is positive proof of "more education for the dollar." If this policy succeeds, the nation's education is in danger.

EDUCATION: A "NEW TIME" THE WHITE HOUSE

The aim of criticism says something about its merits. There is much to find fault with and to improve in the public school system and in the pattern of federal financial aid to that system. But it makes a mountain of difference whether an attack upon it comes from a source seeking to help it succeed or from a source convinced that it is doomed to failure. Roger A. Freeman, whose critique of our editorial on the President's recent education reform message was a bit long for the regular Letters space on this page and accordingly appears on page 5 of today's Outlook Section, has been telling the world for 15 years that federal aid to education won't work. It affords, in our judgment, a lugubrious commentary on the point of view from which President Nixon approaches the public school problem that Mr. Freeman is now signing letters on White House stationery over the title, "Special Assistant to the President."

As long ago as 1955, Mr. Freeman took the position—in a pamphlet titled "Federal Aid to Education—Boon or Bane?"—that "if federal aid should be enacted during the second session of the 84th Congress—and this is quite possible, 1956 being an election year—then it will not be done because the states are unable to provide for the schools or because the American people wanted it. It will be done because organized pressure was brought to bear upon individual members of Congress with threats of reprisal, because insufficient effort was made to get the facts to the American public in order to counteract the distortions and propaganda, and because, faced with a clamor for more of the easy money, many congressmen were afraid to vote their convictions in an election year which is always conducive to passing pork barrel legislation. Mr. Freeman's unswerving adherence to this view is a tribute to his sincerity and we welcome his sudden public re-emergence in the thick of the education debate; he is, of course, as entitled to his own opinion as any other man. But it is still a little numbing to find him serving as a special assistant to a President who said as a candidate: "I pledge my administration to be second to none in its concern for education."

Convinced that federal aid is undesirable, Mr. Freeman quotes a passage from the celebrated Coleman report saying that "the physical and economic resources going into a school had very little relationship to the achievements coming out of it"—which, taken entirely by itself, sounds like a suggestion that the states and localities as well as the federal government should abandon support of the schools altogether. But Dr. Coleman's important study was focused on "Equality of Educational Opportunity," and it's preeminent point was that school achievement is significantly conditioned by a child's background and early childhood training. "One implication stands out above all," Dr. Coleman says: "That schools bring little influence to bear on a child's achievement that is independent of his background and general social context; and that this very lack of an independent effect means that the inequalities imposed on children by their home, neighborhood, and peer environment are carried along to become the inequalities with which they confront adult life at the end of school."

This is why Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act was aimed at inner city schools and at poor, disadvantaged children. But as we protested editorially a few months ago in a comment on the constructive report of the Washington Research Project and the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, "Title I funds have not reached eligible children in many school districts, have not been concentrated as they should have been on those most in need and have, instead, been dissipated for general school purposes and, in some instances to replace state expenditures."

Mr. Freeman dazzles us with a lot of figures intended to show that expenditures for better buildings and more teachers are of no avail and a lot of figures to show that expenditures for schools have been munificent. His statistics all involve national averages. It makes a lot of difference to a child, however, whether he attends an urban or a suburban school. In New York City itself, the per pupil expenditure in 1968–69 was $1031; in Scarsdale, it was $1628. In Los Angeles $434 was spent for each pupil, while $1131 was expended for each in Beverly Hills. In Cleveland, it was $630 as compared with $968 in Shaker Heights. So it goes. Professor Herbert Kiesling of the University of Indiana is quoted in a report on Schools and Inequality prepared for the Urban Coalition as saying that "the relationship of expenditure to performance in large urban districts is quite strong."

One additional contrast between schools for the poor and schools for the well-to-do is illuminating—and in an area where the President has been particularly myopic. "In addition to the tendency for low SES (socio-economic status) schools to be old and crowded, they seem to be less well equipped," according to the Urban Coalition study. "Moreover, low SES schools have available fewer library books per 1000 students. At the extremes of social class, the inequity of available library books is especially great. The lowest SES schools are able to provide 1.7 library books per child while the highest SES schools provide 5.4 library books per child."

The first function of federal aid to education is to redress these monstrous imbalances. That is what Title I is all about. To say that we cannot do anything at all about this situation because we do not yet know everything about the learning process—and to say it to inner city children whose learning time and opportunity are irrecoverable—seems to us an unconscionable irresponsibility. We must do the best we can, the most we can.

Remarking just a few days ago that drug addiction in the schools is "increasing at an alarming rate," President Nixon said he was releasing frozen federal funds and initiating new programs to tackle the problem. Well, there's a lot we don't know about drug addiction; but we are glad the President is not holding back those funds until another commission is established and another study is completed. It is imperative to live today. If Mr. Nixon's and Mr. Freeman's strictures on the shortcomings of federal aid to education were presented in the context of an effort to perfect the program and make it more effective, we would join them unreservedly. Inaction seems to us the counsel of defeatism and despair.

A COMMUNICATION

Your March 7 editorial "The Never-Never Land of Education" charges that "There is hardly a platitude ever uttered about education that is not contained in the President's special message to Congress on educational reform. It is as though someone snipped sentences from all the annual school reports ever written—on a frequency of their recurrence." From there you advance a program of your own which you desire the President to recommend. Your program has one clear advantage over the President's—not only has it been proposed in hundreds of reports over many years in "all the annual reports ever written"—your proposals have been carried out. That they did not produce the promised results apparently does not deter you from repeating over and over again, as you have for years, the same old tune, like a stuck gramophone needle.

Your six points were:

1. School buildings are "antiquated, desperately overcrowded and hazardous . . ."
2. The pupil-faculty ratio is unconscionably high and "it is indisputable that a high ratio of pupils to teachers impedes learning."
3. "Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, designed to aid disadvantaged children in disadvantaged areas of the big cities, has abundantly proved itself in practice. It works . . ."
4. School libraries are an invaluable aid . . .
5. Schools need more professional aides besides teachers . . .
6. The Headstart program should be pushed.

This adds up to little more than the conventional wisdom that our educational problems can be solved by pouring new billions into the same old system. If the quality of education were proportionate to the number of dollars spent—American education should have long ago entered its golden age.

Janes S. Coleman of Johns Hopkins, who in 1965/66 headed the most extensive examination of American public schools ever undertaken, found to his surprise: "The evidence revealed that within broad geographic regions, and for each racial and ethnic group, the physical and economic resources going into a school had very little relationship to the achievements coming out of it." He concluded that "if it were otherwise, we could give simple prescriptions: Increase teachers' salaries, lower classroom size, enlarge libraries, and so on. But the evidence does not allow such simple answers."

Reviewing the ensuing debate in the New Work Times Magazine of August 10, 1969, Christopher Jencks of the Harvard School of Education summarized his conclusions: "Variation in schools' fiscal and human resources have very little effect on student achievement—probably even less than the Coleman Report originally implied."

The most thorough report on New York City schools ("New York City School Fact Book," Institute for Community Studies at Queens College, CUNY, Marilyn Gittel, Director, 1969) found that: "The evidence we have accumulated is somewhat surprising. We have recorded traditional variables that supposedly affect the quality of learning: class size, school expenditure, pupil/teacher ratio, condition of building, teacher experience and the like. Yet, there seems to be no direct relationship between these school measurements and performance. Schools that have exceptionally small class registers, staffed with experienced teachers, spend more money per pupil, and possess modern facilities do not reflect exceptional academic competence."

"Nor has the More Effective Schools Program—a saturation services compensatory education program of high cost—shown any noteworthy results in this year's tabulations. Of twenty one schools measured in the MES program, pupils in only four, mostly middle class white, read on grade level."

The fact is that over the past 20 years, while enrollment in the public schools rose slightly better than 80 per cent, school revenues increased 350 per cent in price adjusted dollars (from $5.4 to $33.5 billion in actual dollars.) This is almost three times the rate of the simultaneous rise in national income or product.

Expenditure per pupil in average daily attendance jumped from $209 to $766 in actual dollars—an increase of 133 per cent in constant dollars.

What did this accomplish? There are now about four pupils fewer in the average classroom than there were 20 years ago. In his first education message in 1961, President Kennedy, in proposing federal school construction aid, suggested that 600,000 classrooms ought to be built during the 1960s to take care of all needs. Actually, about 700,000 new classrooms were completed in the 1960's, without a federal construction aid program, but you still list a classroom shortage as your first point. The ratio of the instructional staff to pupils was meanwhile reduced from 1:26.1 to 1:21.3, which means that there are now 4.8 fewer pupils per teacher than there were in 1950. Moreover, the Coleman Report—an a few hundred other research reports summarized in the Encyclopedia of Educational Research—were unable to find a correlation between class size and pupil achievement.

The nonteaching professional staff of the public schools—administrators, counselor, advisors, psychologists, librarians, etc., increased from 48,000 to 220,000 in the past 20 years (the ratio to pupils fell from 1:523 to 1:215).

Your claim that the Title I program of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 for "disadvantaged children" "works" flies in the face of all known facts. In his message, the President quoted a summary by the Office of Education of reports on Title I that a child who participated in a Title I project had only a 19 per cent chance of a significant achievement gain, a 13 per cent chance of a significant achievement loss, and a 68 per cent chance of no change at all.

The U.S. Civil Rights Commission found after reviewing the major compensatory education programs since 1957 that "none of the programs appear to have raised significantly the achievement of participating pupils." Compensatory programs have been tried for over a decade, Title I programs for almost 5 years, with an expenditure of $5 billion. Could we not expect that at least some modest results should by now have shown up?

According to latest available reports, New York City spends about twice as much per pupil in its public schools as other large cities and it employs one-third more teachers in relation to pupils. Its teacher-pupil ratio dropped from 1:23.9 to 1:18.5 over the past six years. However, not only are pupil achievements much below norms in the city, with almost two-thirds of all pupils below reading comprehension norms in 1969—they have been coming down. One-third of the pupils are one year or more below the norm, one-fourth two years below their grade level.

The 21 schools in New York's "More Effective Schools" project have an average teacher-pupil ratio of 1:11.7 and an expenditure of $1,275 per pupil—but their educational achievements rank below other schools and are not improving.

The number of examples could be multiplied: through thousands of compensatory education projects from "Higher Horizons" in New York, to the Banneker project in St. Louis and to the Madison project in Syracuse runs a story of consistent failure to produce the educational achievements which their sponsors promised.

What this adds up to is, of course, not that we should quit increasing school resources every year. The President made that abundantly clear. But to keep pouring additional billions into programs that have proven ineffective without trying to find methods to accomplish the desired ends provides no solution to our educational problems.

Far from repeating other reports, the President sounded an entirely new tune in his message, a tune that had not been heard before but needed airing: let us find out through research what methods will accomplish what we are aiming at—an adequate education for millions of American children who now lag one or several years behind national norms, who leave the schools, with or without a diploma, and cannot read, write or count sufficiently to meet even minimal civic and occupational requirements.

To use a comparison with health programs: intensive research has so far not produced an effective preventive or cure for cancer. This is why work needs to continue on a broad scale until victory is won. No purpose would be served by extending on a national scale a particular cancer program—until one has proven its value. This is in contrast to polio and numerous contagious diseases against which effective cures were found—and extended to cover the population.

Maybe it would be easier, from a political point of view, to pretend that several additional billions of dollars in federal funds would solve our school problems. If they could—why did boosting school funds from $5.8 billion in 1950 to $38.5 billion in 1970 not bring us any closer? Would we not, by holding out promises that cannot be fulfilled, generate more disappointment, frustration and violence when hopes are first aroused and then crushed—as they were in recent years?

Do honesty and a sense of public responsibility not require us to admit that money is not an adequate substitute for methods which have not yet been found? Should we not concentrate our efforts at discovering better methods than pretend that more square feet of classroom space per pupil or fewer per teacher are the answer when it has become evident that they are not?

There is probably no solution to the school problem that will not cost large sums of money. But until we learn how to apply the funds, in a manner that will produce tangible results, there is little to be gained by spending the money anyway, just so we can pretend that we have done everything.

This was the first message on education by any President that faced the problems squarely, admitted the existing shortcomings and did not promise a quick solution by the infusion of a few billions in federal money. It was the most frank and most sophisticated message ever on the subject of education. Your attempt to downgrade it and to bring efforts to improve the education of American children to the lowest denominator shows an approach that has proven futile time and again, an unwillingness to understand the nature of the problem.

The Congress and the American people have a right to expect that their President tells them a straight story, even if it hurts. This is what the message did. To create a mirage by reducing our educational problems to mere dollars, as you did, may confuse some, but not many and not for long. Most Americans now realize, or will soon, that the most urgent need at this time is to get more education for every dollar spent. This is what we are hoping to accomplish.

ROGER A. FREEMAN,
Special Assistant to the President.
WASHINGTON.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, March 26, 1970

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Edward G. Latch, D.D., offered the following prayer:

This do in remembrance of Me.—Luke 22: 19.

As we continue our way through Holy Week, our Father, we would climb the stairs that lead to the upper room where we may be still and know that Thou art God, and from Thee receive forgiveness for our sins, love for our hearts, wisdom for our minds, and humility for our spirits.

Here we pray for our families whose affection and understanding make life worth living, for our friends whose faithfulness and friendliness make our existence a joy, for our Nation where freedom is a rich blessing and in whose heart we seek good will with justice for all, for the nations of the world, asking that we learn to treat them as we want them to treat us.

From this upper room of prayer send us out into the world to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with Thee.

In the spirit of the Master we pray. Amen.

SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC REFORM IN VIETNAM WILL HELP SAVE AMERICAN LIVES

(Mr. MOSS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, this day may well be one of the great days in modern history. Today could be the beginning of the end of the war in Vietnam. This is the day that South Vietnam takes a giant step toward becoming a real functioning democracy.

In a ceremony at Cantho in the Mekong Delta, President Thieu signed into law one of the most sweeping land reform programs proposed by any government in power in the history of the world. The new law should completely abolish all tenant farming in Vietnam and give the land free to the peasant. A great national holiday has been declared in Vietnam to mark the event.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the peasants are weeping in Vietnam. But for the first time, they are weeping for joy—not out of anguish, pain, and hopelessness. Today is the day the peasants of Vietnam are freed from economic serfdom. No longer should they have to pay up to 80 percent of their crops to landlords who have been exploiting them for generations.

This action is a body blow to the Vietcong. It may totally eclipse any military action that could be taken against the Communists. They have been able to recruit guerrillas by falsely promising to the peasants: "Give us your sons and we will give you your land." The whole history of Communist agrarian reform proves that such lands eventually end up in the hands of the state.

As chairman of the House Foreign Operations and Government Information Subcommittee, I want to commend President Thieu for this action. It is a step our subcommittee has been championing for 4 years—ever since we made our first examination of the economy and efficiency of U.S. aid efforts in the field of agrarian reform.

Our interest in land reform progress in Vietnam has been a totally bipartisan one. The gentleman from New York (Mr. REID) and his Republican colleagues on the subcommittee strongly encouraged and supported our attempts to make U.S. aid in agrarian reform as economical and efficient as possible. That is the only way it could be made truly effective.

I am also proud of the fact that a distinguished American law professor—Dr. Roy L. Prosterman of the University of Washington—played a key role in South Vietnam's efforts to bring reality to this dream. Over the years, he became the principal architect and exponent of the land reform program. In my view, he should be awarded the Medal of Freedom. It is my hope President Nixon will consider such a nomination.

It is also my hope that the United States will continue to take an active role in the successful accomplishment of this progressive program to put economic power into the hands of the many instead of just a few. I might emphasize that the total cost of this major social and economic reform is equivalent to 1 week of what it is costing the United States to wage war in Vietnam.

Mr. Speaker, this program of land reform is going to save American lives in Vietnam. The Communists are going to find it harder and harder to recruit peasants to act as guerrillas. And it will give the peasants a real stake in the future. They will want to protect their ownership of land and turn against the Communists. So this is why I say it well could be the beginning of the end of the Vietnam war. Let us pray to God this is so.

I include an article from the Washington Evening Star of March 25, and a letter at this point in the RECORD:

VIETNAM LAND REFORM

There is a great predilection among the news disseminators of this country to point out, with appropriate expressions of horror, everything that is wrong with the government in Saigon. This is as it should be. President Thieu should be criticized for every repressive move he makes.

But an interest in Saigon's warts should not make it impossible to appreciate the occasional beauty spots that appear. And yet, to judge from the reaction to the passage of Thieu's land reform program, our sense of appreciation has become dulled. The final passage of the reform bill—the best news to come out of Vietnam since the end of the Japanese occupation—was, with a very few exceptions overlooked.

The program is important for three reasons. First, it is right for the peasants and tenant farmers to own the land they till. Second, it can have a considerable beneficial impact on the popularity and the stability of the central government. Finally, it robs the Viet Cong of their major selling point.

The plan calls for the free distribution of 3 million acres of land among some 1 million families. It is—disregarding the Chinese communist program—the most massive land reform project in the Far East of modern history. And the Chinese program can, in common with all Communist land reforms, be logically disregarded in view of its temporary nature. The record shows that soon after the distribution all the land is reclaimed by the state.

There is little justification for cynicism about Thieu's intention to carry out the reform. The program was conceived by him and pushed through a reluctant assembly. Additional evidence of his sincerity can be found in the fact that he has already initiated the distribution of 150,000 acres of government-owned lands—a move that deprived some well-placed officials of a major source of income.

The plan will cost the Saigon government some $400 million over the next eight years in payment to the former landowners. The United States has, so far, pledged $40 million toward that cost. If more is needed it should be promptly forthcoming.

The total cost would be less than the cost to us of one week of the Vietnam war. When the land reform is carried out, it will seriously undermine the appeal of the Viet Cong and thus be a major incentive to them to seek an acceptable political settlement with Saigon. Washington, as a matter of enlightened self-interest, should give the program every bit of encouragement and support it needs.

DECEMBER 14, 1967.

Hon. DEAN RUSK,
Secretary of State, Department of State, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: We, as the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Foreign Operations and Government Information Subcommittee, after having carefully studied the problems of land reform in Vietnam, have reached certain conclusions which we hope will be embodied ultimately in a report to be issued by the House Committee on Government Operations.

In our judgment, however, land reform in Vietnam is a matter of sufficient urgency to warrant an interim letter voicing our concern that sweeping and dramatic actions must be undertaken promptly by the Government of South Vietnam with the full and vigorous support of United States officials.

The people of South Vietnam have been subjected to a long history of unfulfilled promises with regard to land reform. The most recent of these include public commitments made at the Manila Conference, in the Constitutional Assembly, and in the "program of action" announced late this fall by President Thieu and Premier Loc.

The sad fact is that each "commitment" has been followed in turn by an absence of major substantive action. The distribution of token amounts of land, re-establishment of expired land leases, and issuance of permanent rather than provisional land titles is not the kind of major action we believe is sufficient and imperative. Our findings, supported by a study conducted by the General Accounting Office, reflect a record of inadequacy:

1. Since 1954, the Government of South Vietnam (GVN) has acquired only part of the arable land in South Vietnam appropriate for expropriation and has been slow to distribute the land it has acquired. Distribution came to a virtual standstill between 1962 and 1967.

2. A comparison of Vietnamese law with other land appropriation programs in Asia indicates that the present maximum retention limit of 247 acres may well be excessive. A retention limit of seven to ten acres would appear to be more equitable.

3. Of the more than 2.47 million acres of arable land acquired by the GVN for distribution, only about 667,000 acres have actually been distributed to 128,000 families since 1954. These figures include 51,800 acres actually distributed to 12,000 families since January 1, 1967.

4. In 1958 the GVN acquired 566,000 acres of choice riceland from French owners. Although the GVN has rented about 240,000 acres of this land to small farmers, no actual distribution of land was made until October 1966, eight years after the land was expropriated.

5. The Montagnards feel that their lands have been unjustly confiscated. On October 17, 1964, the GVN decided to grant the Montagnards lands they occupied and cultivated. However, no law has been enacted by the GVN to implement this policy.

6. Although the GVN has enacted some basic legislation relating to the rental of land, we have information which shows that the GVN has not fully enforced these laws. There was some evidence indicating that GVN armed forces had been assisting in the unlawful collection of back rents and taxes.

The Viet Cong, during this period, have instituted their own land reform program—distributing reportedly some five times the amount of land distributed by the GVN—and this program has not been effectively countered by the GVN. The Viet Cong have eliminated landlord domination and reallocated lands owned by absentee landlords and the GVN to the landless and others who cooperate with Viet Cong authorities.

We are not unaware of new initiatives taken by Ambassador Bunker at the direction of the Department of State, nor with the emphasis placed by United States officials upon title distribution and the establishment of clear occupancy rights for farmers at the time of the pacification of secure areas. Further, we are cognizant of other substantial efforts by Embassy Saigon to aid GVN agricultural officials in improving farming practices and increase yield per acre.

But we believe that major actions must be taken promptly, including accelerated distribution of land presently available and the total remission of rents for arable lands—at least in certain areas—with appropriate compensation for landlords.

Mr. Secretary, we trust that during the impending period of Congressional adjournment, the Department of State will take such action as is necessary to make crystal clear to the Government of South Vietnam the imperative nature of its undertaking a true commitment of action with regard to the pressing problems of land reform. The time for pledges to be fulfilled by the GVN has more than come.

Very truly yours,

JOHN E. MOSS,
OGDEN R. REID,
Members of Congress.

ADJOURNMENT TO TUESDAY, MARCH 31, 1970

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate Concurrent Resolution 59 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the Senate concurrent resolution, as follows:

S. CON. RES. 59

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That when the Senate adjourn on March 26, 1970, it stand in adjournment until 12 o'clock meridian, Tuesday, March 31, 1970.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ALBERT

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ALBERT: On line 4, page 1, strike out the period and insert: "; and that when the House adjourns on Thursday, March 26, 1970, it stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian, Tuesday, March 31, 1970."

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GROSS. What is the parliamentary situation? Is not unanimous consent required to call up this resolution?

The SPEAKER. No, it is a privileged matter.

(Mr. ALBERT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALBERT. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. I am not quite clear as to what this resolution calls for with the amendment inserted. Would the gentleman please explain it?

Mr. ALBERT. The Senate has sent over a concurrent resolution which would permit the Senate to adjourn until Tuesday of next week. We are simply attempting to amend it so that when the House adjourns today, under the resolution we would also return on Tuesday next. If the gentleman will bear with me, if we get all the consent requests that we hope to get today, we do not expect to have business on Tuesday next.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ALBERT. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. The distinguished majority leader is well aware that there is supposed to be a conference in operation. I shall have more to say about that conference a little later today, I hope. But I wonder if we should, at this hour, not have the ability to call the House into session on Monday if some agreement can be reached. I doubt that it will be. But I am not as optimistic about the situation as some people at the other end of Pennsylvania seem to be, and perhaps some Members of Congress with relation to what may develop next week.

Mr. ALBERT. The gentleman is more aware of what is going on in the conference than I. In any event, I do not think we would be prepared, especially with the Senate adjourning until Tuesday, to consider legislation before Tuesday.

Mr. GROSS. If the gentleman will yield further, I will say to the gentleman that if I had it within my power—and I do not have—I would try to defeat any such resolution under the circumstances that presently exist.

But I see nothing to be gained by the House being in session tomorrow or Monday, and therefore I am not going to ask for a rollcall on this resolution or comment any further about it.

Mr. ALBERT. The gentleman's logic is absolutely convincing and I agree with him.

Mr. WAGGONNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALBERT. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. WAGGONNER. Mr. Speaker, let me see if I understand, for my benefit as well as the benefit of my colleagues, what the situation is. Earlier this year when we convened for the second session of the 91st Congress an announcement was made to this body that we would adjourn from the close of business today until Tuesday next.

Mr. ALBERT. That is correct.

Mr. WAGGONNER. Then there was a change made to that notice, and the Congress was told when we adjourned at the conclusion of business today, we would adjourn until 12 o'clock noon on April 6.

Mr. ALBERT. That is what we contemplated.

Mr. WAGGONNER. Now the gentleman is offering an amendment to a privileged resolution coming from the Senate, which reverts back to the initial announcement calling for the reconvening of the House on Tuesday next after the close of business today. Is that correct?

Mr. ALBERT. That is correct.

May I say to the gentleman it is implicit in any advance announcement—for instance, we have announced we hope we will be able to adjourn earlier—this year, that circumstances which are of national importance may alter our plans. We cannot help that. We had intended to adjourn until April 6 as we had announced, and that was our intention until the developments of the past few days.

Mr. WAGGONNER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, the gentleman said, in answer to the gentleman from Iowa, that it was not the intention of the leadership to conduct business or to schedule business on Tuesday when we are scheduled to reconvene.

Mr. ALBERT. That is correct.

Mr. WAGGONNER. What can the gentleman tell the House about Wednesday and Thursday and Friday of next week? Some of us have made some rather far-reaching commitments.

Mr. ALBERT. I realize that. No one is more discommoded than I. I have canceled all of my plans. I am sorry I had to do it, but let me say to the gentleman that we do not intend to schedule anything that is not related to a national emergency until Tuesday a week. We will not schedule anything until then.

Mr. WAGGONNER. Until Tuesday a week?

Mr. ALBERT. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WAGGONNER. Until Tuesday a week, or Tuesday of next week?

Mr. ALBERT. Until Tuesday a week; until Tuesday, April 7. We are coming back next week because of the postal crisis so we can act if necessary, and I will advise the House at this time, that we will undertake, if something develops that will help settle the postal crisis, not to take any action until we have sent out notices 48 hours in advance to all Members of the House.

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I yield first to the gentleman from New York, and then I will yield to the acting minority leader. I yield now to the gentleman from New York (Mr. DULSKI).

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, to clarify the situation, we have been in conference for the last 2 days. We met twice yesterday and also this morning. We have not been able to attain any progress as far as marking up H.R. 13000 is concerned. A resolution was adopted by the Senate conferees which I will bring into the record on my own time, and I have my own statement pertaining to why the Congress has to be available if we are able to bring back a conference report.

The genesis of this situation is the promise of the President and the Postmaster General to meet with the labor leaders and negotiate the full range of postal employees' grievances. The Senate conferees will mark up H.R. 13000 only when that is done.

The Senate conferees, as I said, disclosed that attitude by a resolution that they adopted today. The conferees on this side were willing to mark up the bill immediately. That is where we were stymied, so that we do not have a report. As I understand it, there may be a chance for a report within the next few days.

The only thing I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma is that the "5-day limitation" on labor-management negotiations expires on Monday. At that time, the President of the United States, Postmaster General Blount, and the Bureau of the Budget have to evaluate the demands of the postal unions.

It is only fair that we adjourn to a time certain, and then if we do have a sudden breakthrough—if the negotiations are successful or if the parties do not agree—then the conferees on H.R. 13000 will go back into conference and report promptly to their respective Houses.

Mr. ALBERT. I thank the gentleman for his statement which clarifies the situation.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALBERT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. I thank the gentleman from Oklahoma for yielding.

I merely want to say that the distinguished majority leader did us the courtesy of clearing this Senate resolution, together with the amendment thereto he has offered, with the minority side of the aisle. We certainly concur in the propriety of the action he is recommending; and I believe, particularly with the assurance we have that adequate notice will be given to Members to return in case action is required on a conference report, that we can take the action the gentleman suggests.

Mr. ALBERT. We are going to endeavor to give every Member, or at least his office, at least 48 hours' notice before we schedule anything in connection with this matter.

Mr. WAGGONNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield once again?

Mr. ALBERT. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. WAGGONNER. Will someone tell me what the relationship is of the arbitration now underway between the Postmaster General and the postal employees, at least their representatives, and the conference on the two pay bills between the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States? Is it intended that the conferees are going to wait for the executive branch of the Government to tell us what to do, or is the Congress going to take action?

Mr. ALBERT. The conferees on both sides have to agree.

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALBERT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DULSKI. The House conferees adopted a resolution by themselves to go ahead immediately with H.R. 13000. The other body adopted a resolution that they do not want to mark up any part of H.R. 13000 at this time.

If the distinguished majority leader will yield further, let me read the item from their resolution:

2. The Senate conferees will act in conference, or if necessary will recommend to the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and the Senate the immediate enactment of legislation for postal pay increases when (1) the President recommends legislation on the basis of successful negotiations or (2) the parties to the negotiations announce that they agree that they have bargained in good faith with every intention to reach an agreement, and that they are unable to do so.

So the House has acted responsibly and the Senate has not acceded to our request for us to continue.

Mr. ALBERT. To clarify the matter for the record, when the gentleman said "the other body" he meant to say "The conferees of the other body"?

Mr. DULSKI. The Senate conferees, yes.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALBERT. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOLAND. I wonder if the distinguished chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee can advise the House as to whether or not the Post Office Department and the Postmaster General, or the executive branch, have been keeping the House conferees informed as to what is developing in the negotiations between the executive department and the postal unions.

Mr. DULSKI. No, they have not.

Mr. BOLAND. And whether or not they have been keeping the conferees on the other side informed?

Mr. DULSKI. Yes, they have.

Mr. ALBERT. As far as I know they have not been keeping the leadership of the House informed.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALBERT. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. I thank the distinguished majority leader for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, as one of the House conferees on H.R. 13000, the bill to provide pay increases for postal workers and other Federal employees, I must report to the House, with regret, that I have never witnessed more duplicity and futility.

The conference started at 10 o'clock yesterday morning. There has been a total of three meetings of the conferees yesterday and today.

The conferees of the other body have been adamant in their refusal to work on either their version or the House version of H.R. 13000.

Mr. Speaker, I could understand the necessity for exploratory discussions within the so-called conference at the initial session yesterday morning. But when the conferees reconvened yesterday evening it became fully obvious that the conferees on the part of the other body had not the slightest intention of participating in specific and meaningful negotiations.

When this situation became clear, the House conferees, to make their position unqualified, adopted a motion declaring they were then ready, willing, and able to begin immediately the markup of H.R. 13000.

The conferees of the other body then adopted a motion which had the effect of outright refusal to begin an immediate and effective conference.

Again this morning, the House conferees were ready to begin meaningful negotiations. Again the representatives of the other body refused and on the specious grounds that they were awaiting the results of certain negotiations that are taking place beyond the Halls of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I entered into this conference in good faith and I assumed that Members of the other body likewise accepted the call to conference in good faith.

Up to this point I have believed there was a separation of powers in this Government. I now question whether the Congress is autonomous. When and under what conditions the conferees on H.R. 13000 will again meet is anyone's guess.

Mr. Speaker, this to me is a sad and incredible performance. I can only say to you that a majority of your conferees have tried to honorably and faithfully represent the House of Representatives.

Mr. ALBERT. I thank the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. ALBERT).

The amendment was agreed to.

The Senate concurrent resolution, as amended, was concurred in.

The title was amended to read as follows: "To provide for the adjournment of the Congress from March 26, 1970, until March 31, 1970."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING CLERK TO RECEIVE MESSAGES AND SPEAKER TO SIGN ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that notwithstanding the adjournment of the House from March 26 to March 31, the Clerk be authorized to receive messages from the Senate and that the Speaker be authorized to sign any enrolled bills and joint resolutions duly passed by the two Houses and found truly enrolled.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING THE SPEAKER TO ENTERTAIN MOTIONS TO SUSPEND THE RULES—CALL OF THE CONSENT CALENDAR ON TUESDAY, APRIL 7

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday, April 7, it shall be in order for the Speaker to entertain motions to suspend the rules notwithstanding the provisions of clause 1, rule XXVII, and that it shall also be in order to consider business under clause 4, rule XIII, the Consent Calendar rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

PRIME INTEREST RATE

(Mr. BEVILL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BEVILL. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to express my strong support of House Concurrent Resolution 522, which is being considered at this time by the House Banking and Currency Committee. Passage of this resolution, which I am cosponsoring, asks the administration to revise its policy of high interest rates, and have the Federal Reserve Board take steps to gradually roll the prime interest rates back to 6 percent.

During the last 14 months, almost a million Americans were added to the list of unemployed and inflation has continued to rise at a fast rate.

During this same period, the small businessman, hit sharply by increases in interest rates, has curtailed business expansion, which has resulted in production cutbacks and job losses.

High interest rates and tight-money conditions have made it impossible for half the people of this Nation to purchase their own home.

Accordng to a recent study made by the House Banking and Currency Committee, over 100 million Americans cannot afford payments on the minimum loan for an adequate house. This study shows that to buy a home, a family must have a gross income of at least $13,000 a year and be able to make monthly payments of $226. And the increase in interest rates has caused rent to go up to an all-time high.

While these are but a few of the most obvious examples, there are many more. The areas hit first and hardest by rising interest rates are most noticeable. The actual impact, however, is far greater, because the influence of interest rates on prices reaches practically every area of our economy.

The policy of deliberately maintaining high interest rates which has been in effect for the past 14 months, is apparently having no measurable effect on lowering prices.

High taxes, high interest rates, rising cost of food, housing, and medical care bear most heavily upon the low- and middle-income families of our country.

What is needed most at this time is a sound economic program which will put the United States on a stable course and avoid a recession.

I am heartened by the fact that many of the major banks across the country have cut their prime lending rate to 8 percent from a record 8½ percent. I believe a large measure of the credit for bringing about this reduction in interest rates must go to the House Banking and Currency Committee. For this committee has persistently focused attention on the need to reduce interest rates, and the effect these rates are having on the American economy.

This is a beginning. But we cannot stop at this point. I believe the President should use the prestige of his office to persuade the big banks of this country to continue to roll back interest rates, gradually, until the prime interest rate is back to 6 percent.

Additionally, I believe the President should insist that these big banks exercise restraint during the coming months.

POSTAL STRIKE

(Mr. MONTGOMERY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to commend the military services for the outstanding manner in which they performed in New York during the postal employees strike. Regular forces of the Army, Air Force, and Navy, as well as reservists and National Guardsmen, were used for 3 days in New York. They handled themselves in a quiet, orderly, and efficient manner.

Guardsmen and reservists from the New York area worked in seven post offices in New York with the guidance of supervisory personnel. Their assignments included sorting and sacking the mail, as well as delivering it in the financial district. The postal supervisors indicate they did an outstanding job.

I think the truly important point to be made is that over 95 percent of the men assigned to the units that were called out reported to duty. This is really an outstanding turnout on such short notice and when you consider some were probably sick or out of town. The officers and men of the Guard and Reserves are citizen soldiers who make personal sacrifices when called to duty. Again this week they proved their worth when they responded to the call of the President of the United States.

SUIT TO REAPPORTION NATIONAL CONVENTIONS

(Mr. FLYNT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Speaker, the attorney general of the State of Georgia today filed suit to reapportion the 1972 Democratic and Republican National Convention on a one-man one-vote basis.

The suit, filed Wednesday in the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., points out that the two national political parties apportion delegates to their national conventions based on how the voters of a State voted in the last presidential election, not on the basis of population.

The Democratic Party awards 10 votes to States which went Democratic. The Republican Party gives at least six votes to Republican States. Georgians, who gave neither party a majority in 1968, would be underrepresented at both national conventions in 1972. Every State will be underrepresented in one or the other national convention.

The suit charges, in effect, that the two political parties share monopoly power in electing U.S. Presidents and that their malapportioned national conventions are an integral part of the presidential election process.

In addition to the political parties, the suit, brought by Attorney General Arthur K. Bolton, names the two national committees as defendants. Plaintiffs in the suit include the State of Georgia, the State election board, Governor Lester Maddox, and Secretary of State Ben Fortson.

I include as a part of my remarks a copy of the petition as filed:

Fortson, Jr., individually and as Secretary of State of the State of Georgia and Chairman of the State Election Board of Georgia; Mrs. Harry B. Williams, W. F. Blanks, and John W. Greer, individually and as members of the State Election Board of Georgia; and Ralph D. Dougherty and Harold N. Hill, individually.

2. The State of Georgia and the State Election Board of Georgia bring this action pursuant to authority granted, inter alia, by Georgia Code Sections 40–1610 (Ga. Laws 1931, pp. 7, 39), 34–202 and 34–203(a) (Ga. Laws 1964, Extra Sess., pp. 26, 35, 36, as amended).

4. The plaintiffs bring this action in their behalf and in behalf of all qualified voters of the State of Georgia who are aggrieved by the hereinafter alleged dilution and impairment of their right to vote for Presidential Electors. The members of this class are so numerous as to make it impractical to bring them all before the Court. There are questions of law and fact common to the class. The claims of the named plaintiffs are typical of the claims of the class and the named plaintiffs will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class.

5. The named individual plaintiffs include Democratic and Republican voters.

Said class includes persons who were residents of other States at the time of the 1968 General Election and who are now residents of Georgia registered and eligible to vote in the 1972 General Election.

7. The defendants, as hereinafter alleged, are penalizing the plaintiffs and the class they represent, particularly the aforesaid members of the plaintiff class who were too young to vote in 1968, and those who were residents of other States in 1968, by reason of the failure of the Georgia voters who voted in 1968 to elect either the Democratic or Republican nominees for the office of Presidential Electors.

13. This is an action to redress the deprivation, under color of State laws, statutes, regulations, customs and usages, of rights and privileges secured by the Constitution and by acts of Congress providing for equal rights. 28 U.S.C. § 1343(3).

14. This is an action to secure equitable and other relief under the Civil Rights Acts of Congress for the protection of civil rights, including the right to vote. 28 U.S.C. § 1343(4).

15. This is also an action for a declaratory judgment. 28 U.S.C. § 2201.

Statement of the claim

16. Article II, Section 1, of the Constitution of the United States provides in pertinent part as follows:

"The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected, as follows:

"Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress. . . ."

17. Every four (4) years since 1788, a President and Vice President have been elected. The last such election occurred in 1968 and the next will occur in 1972.

18. There exists in this nation today a two political party system, which system has existed since at least 1868. The two political parties are the defendant National Democratic Party and the defendant National Republican Party.

19. The political party system of nominating conventions to choose candidates for the Presidency began in 1832 in the Democratic Party. The Republican Party met in its first national convention in 1856.

20. Every four (4) years the defendant political parties meet in convention to elect nominees for the offices of President and Vice President.

21. The persons nominated at the respective conventions for the offices of President and Vice President are entitled under the laws of 48 States to have their names placed on the General Election ballot. In the two remaining States, Alabama and Mississippi, the names of presidential electors representing the two political parties are entitled under state law to be placed on the general election ballot.

22. No person not a nominee of one or the other of the two defendant political parties has been elected President or Vice President in the last 100 years.

23. Nomination of the candidates of one's choice at one of defendants' national conventions as nominee for the office of President or Vice President is the only means available to succeed in electing such candidates to such offices.

24. Failure to become the nominee for the office of President or Vice President of one or the other of the two defendant political parties is equivalent to defeat.

25. Voters in the United States, including voters in plaintiff State, are effectively limited in their choice of President and Vice President to the nominees of one or the other of the defendant political parties.

26. The nominees of the two defendant political parties are chosen in malapportioned National Conventions.

27. The defendant Democratic National Committee is the permanent agency authorized to act in behalf of the defendant National Democratic Party during intervals between Democratic National Conventions, in accordance with the Rules of the defendant Democratic National Party.

28. The defendant National Democratic Party has delegated to the defendant Democratic National Committee to apportion among the States, the District of Columbia, and certain territories, the number of votes to be cast at the Democratic National Convention.

29. The defendant Democratic National Committee adopted and there was in use at the 1968 Democratic National Convention the following formula of apportionment:

"Resolved That the distribution of votes, delegates and alternates from the various States and territories to the Democratic National Convention to be held in Chicago on the twenty-sixth day of August, 1968, be as follows:

"(1) Each State shall have three (3) Convention votes for each of the Electors from that State in the Electoral College.

"(2) Each State shall have a popular vote bonus equal to one Convention vote for each 100,000 popular votes, or major fraction thereof, cast in that State in 1964 for Electors who either voted for the nominees of the 1964 Democratic National Convention or who were not elected but ran on the ticket of voting for said nominees: Provided, That (i) there shall be a minimum of one such bonus vote for each State.

"(3) There shall be a victory bonus of ten (10) Convention votes for each State which cast its Electoral votes for the nominees of the 1964 Democratic National Convention.

"(4) Each member of the Democratic National Committee elected by the 1964 Democratic National Convention or subsequent thereto by the Democratic National Committee shall have one Convention vote, said vote to be personal and to be incapable of exercise by any alternate.

"(5) Canal Zone, Guam, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands shall have twenty-three (23) Convention votes, inclusive of the votes of members of the Democratic National Committee, distributed as follows:

"Canal Zone	5
"Guam	5
"Puerto Rico	8
"Virgin Islands	5"

30. The defendant Republican National Committee is the permanent agency authorized to act in behalf of the defendant National Republican Party during intervals between Republican National Conventions, in accordance with the rules of the defendant National Republican Party.

31. The defendant National Republican Party adopted and there was in use at the 1968 Republican National Convention the following formula of apportionment:

"Rule No. 30

"The membership of the next National Convention shall consist of:

"A. Delegates at Large

"1. Four Delegates at Large from each State.

"2. Two additional delegates at Large for each Representative at Large in Congress from each State.

"3. Nine Delegates at Large for the District of Columbia and three additional Delegates at Large for the District of Columbia if it casts its electoral vote, or a majority thereof, for the Republican Nominee for President in the last preceding Presidential election.

"4. Six additional Delegates at Large from each State casting its electoral vote, or a majority thereof, for the Republican Nominee for President in the last preceding Presidential election. If any State does not cast its electoral vote, or a majority thereof, for the Republican Nominee in the last preceding Presidential election, but at that election or at a subsequent election held prior to the next Republican National Convention elects a Republican United States Senator or a Republican Governor then in such event such State shall be entitled to such additional Delegates at Large.

"5. Five Delegates at Large for Puerto Rico and three Delegates at Large for the Virgin Islands.

"B. District Delegates

"1. One District Delegate from each Congressional District casting two thousand (2,000) votes or more for the Republican Nominee for President or for any elector pledged to vote for the Republican Nominee for President in the last preceding Presidential election, or for the Republican Nominee for Congress in the last preceding Congressional election.

"2. One additional District Delegate for each Congressional District casting ten thousand (10,000) votes or more for the Republican Nominee for President or for any elector pledged to vote for the Republican Nominee for President in the last preceding Presidential election, or for the Republican Nominee for Congress in the last preceding Congressional election."

A chart, marked Appendix B, showing the foregoing distribution of convention votes by States is attached hereto and incorporated herein by reference.

32. Under the apportionment formula prescribed by Republican Rule 30 (par. 31 above), each State had at the 1968 Republican National Convention at least 4 delegates at large, plus 2 delegates at large for each Representative at large in Congress, 6 more delegates at large if the State went Republican for President or if it elected a Republican Senator or Governor, plus 1 district delegate for each congressional district which cast at least 2000 votes (and 1 extra for each casting at least 10,000 votes) for any Republican elector for President or a Republican Congressman in the last election. Each such delegate had one vote in the National Convention.

33. The defendant political parties have for the last several or more national conventions not nominated candidates on the basis of one person-one vote.

34. Unless restrained and enjoined, the defendant National Democratic Committee will adopt for use at the 1972 Democratic Convention a formula for apportionment of votes which provides for victory or popular vote bonuses or both.

35. Unless restrained and enjoined, the defendant Republican National Party will use at the 1972 Republican National Convention a formula for apportionment of votes which provides for votes based upon whether or not the voters of a State voted for the Republican nominees for President and Vice President, or Senator, or Governor, or Congressman, which formula gives excess votes to states which voted for the Republican nominee for President because it also gives extra votes to states in which congressional districts voted for the Republican nominee for President.

36. Eleven States (California, Florida, Massachusetts, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Ohio, Oregon, South Dakota, West Virginia and Wisconsin) and the District of Columbia elect all delegates to the defendants' National Conventions at State primaries, where State laws regulate the primaries and therefore the processes of selection. The number of delegates to be elected at such primaries is controlled by defendants' apportionment formulas.

37. Three States, Illinois, New York and Pennsylvania, elect district delegates to the defendants' National Conventions at State primaries, where State laws regulate the process of selection.

(a) In Illinois, delegates at large are elected by State conventions, the membership in such State conventions being regulated by State law and the members being chosen at county conventions consisting of committeemen elected at primaries regulated by State law.

(b) In New York and Pennsylvania, the delegates at large are elected by State party committees, the members of such State party committees being elected at State primaries, regulated by State law.

(c) The number of delegates to be elected in Illinois, New York and Pennsylvania is controlled by defendants' appointment formulas.

38. In four States, Alabama, Georgia, Montana and Rhode Island, State law permits the political parties to exercise the option of electing National Convention delegates at State primaries (regulated by State law), or by some other means.

(a) In Alabama, the Democratic Party usually utilizes the primary method, whereas the Republican Party usually utilizes the convention method.

(b) In Georgia, State law permits the political parties to adopt rules and regulations providing for the method of electing delegates to National Conventions. The rules of the Democratic Party provide that such delegates shall be selected by its executive committee chairman. The rules of the Republican Party provide that such delegates shall be elected in the primary or by district and state conventions. The Republican custom has been to elect National Convention delegates by conventions.

(c) In Montana, statutes authorize each political party to provide for the method of selection of delegates to national conventions. Both parties utilize the state convention method. Delegates to state conventions are elected in county conventions. State law requires that county conventions be composed of precinct committeemen and women elected in state primaries, which primaries are regulated by state law.

(d) In Rhode Island, party state central committees are authorized by statute, at their discretion, to require election of national convention delegates at primary meetings in cities and towns, but both parties select such delegates pursuant to § 17–12–2 (2) of the Election Laws of the State of Rhode Island.

(e) The number of such delegates to the defendants' National Convention is controlled by defendants' apportionment formulas.

39. In three States, Arizona, Arakansas and Louisiana, all national convention delegates are selected by State party committees.

(a) In Arizona, state law requires that each party have a State committee and permits the selection of delegates by such committees.

(b) In Arkansas, state law requires the selection of national convention delegates by state party committees, such state committees being selected by county conventions held as required by law and attended by county members elected in primaries.

(c) In Louisiana, state law permits the selection of delegates by primary, convention or state central committee, but the political parties do not utilize the primary. Democratic delegates are selected by the state central committee, the composition of which is regulated by law, the membership being elected in the primary. Republican delegates are selected by congressional district and state conventions, as ordered by the state central committee of that party, which committee is regulated by law and elected in the primary.

(d) The number of delegates selected in each of these states is controlled by defendant's apportionment formulas.

40. In twenty-seven States, national convention delegates are selected in state and district conventions.

(a) In Indiana, Maryland and New Mexico, the members of such conventions are elected in primaries which are regulated by state law.

(b) In Colorado, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, North Dakota, Texas, Utah and Wyoming, the members of such conventions are chosen by local bodies elected in primaries or caucuses which are regulated by state law.

(c) In Connecticut, Idaho and Kansas, the members of such conventions are derived partly from primaries and partly from meetings of subordinate party units regulated by state law.

(d) In Hawaii, Kentucky, Maine, Tennessee, Vermont and Virginia, the members of such conventions are elected at meetings of subordinate party units. In Vermont the membership is regulated by state law. In Hawaii and Kentucky the conventions are regulated by state law.

(e) In Delaware, Missouri, Nevada, North Carolina, Oklahoma and South Carolina, the members of such conventions are chosen at county conventions derived from local meetings. In Missouri, Nevada, North Carolina, Oklahoma and South Carolina, they are regulated by state law.

41. Alaska, Delaware, Maine, Oklahoma, Tennessee, Virginia and Washington permit the political parties to choose the method of selecting national convention delegates.

42. In each of the fifty states, the recognition, organization and government of the Democratic and Republican parties is controlled by state law.

43. In each of the fifty states, the selection of delegates to national conventions is governed by state law in either (a) the election of such delegates in primaries regulated by state law, (b) the election of such delegates in state or district conventions, which conventions are regulated by state law, or whose members are chosen in primaries regulaed by state law or whose members are chosen by persons chosen in primaries regulated by state law, or (c) the selection of such delegates by party organizations created and subject to regulation by state law.

44. In each of the fifty States, the method of selecting delegates to national conventions is controlled by, or is subject to the control of, state law, whereas the number of delegates to be selected is controlled by defendants' apportionment formulas.

45. In 1968, fourteen states, California, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Massachusetts, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, West Virginia, Wisconsin, held preferential presidential primaries, regulated by state law.

46. Fifteen states, Arkansas, California, Illinois, Indiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Nebraska, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, and Wisconsin each have statutory instructions applicable to voting by delegates at national conventions.

47. In forty-eight states, the persons nominated at the respective national conventions conducted by defendants are entitled under state law to have their names placed on the general election ballots as the nominees of their respective political parties. In such states, votes cast for the party nominees for President and Vice President count toward the election of presidential electors supporting such nominees. In the two remaining States, Alabama and Mississippi, the names of presidential electors representing the two political parties are entitled under state law to be placed on the general election ballot.

48. All States (except Arizona) and the District of Columbia have statutory instructions governing their Presidential Electors.

49. All fifty States and the District of Columbia have laws, statutes, regulations, customs or usages which bear directly or indirectly upon the selection of delegates to national conventions, the election of presidential electors, and the election of the President and Vice President of the United States.

50. By their laws, statutes, regulations, customs and usages, the States and the District of Columbia have made the national conventions of the defendant political parties their agents for the selection of persons to be voted upon for the Office of President and Vice President of the United States.

51. The States and the District of Columbia have made the defendants' national conventions an integral part of the presidential election process of each State and the District of Columbia.

52. The States and the District of Columbia have afforded the defendants the means of depriving plaintiffs and the class they represent of their constitutional rights.

53. Unless defendants apportionment formulas are revised, plaintiffs and the class they represent will be under represented on the basis of one person-one vote at the defendants' 1972 national conventions.

54. By reason of the malapportionment of defendants' national conventions, plaintiffs are being deprived by defendants, under color of state laws, statutes, regulations, customs and usages, of rights and privileges secured by Article II, Section I, of the Constitution of the United States and Sections 1 and 2 of the Fourteenth Amendment thereto.

55. Plaintiffs and the class they represent are being denied the privileges of citizens of the United States and the equal protection of the laws guaranteed to them by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and are being denied the right to vote on a one person-one vote basis as guaranteed to them by said amendment, by virtue of the malapportioned national conventions conducted by defendants.

56. Plaintiffs have no plain, adequate or complete remedy at law to redress the wrongs herein complained of, and thus bring this action for declaratory and injunctive relief, to avoid delay and a multiplicity of suits and further irreparable injury and damage to plaintiffs and others similarly situated.

Relief

Wherefore, the plaintiffs respectfully pray, as follows:

a) That declaratory judgment issue, holding and declaring that the National Conventions of the Democratic and Republican Parties are malapportioned; and

b) That declaratory judgment issue, holding and declaring that such malapportionment violates plaintiffs' constitutional and civil rights; and

c) That the defendants, their officers, members, and successors, and those they represent, be restrained and enjoined from nominating candidates for the office of President or Vice President in a malapportioned National Convention; and

d) That the Court grant such additional and other relief as may be necessary or proper in the premises.

Respectfully submitted,

ARTHUR K. BOLTON,
Attorney General.
HAROLD N. HILL, Jr.,
Executive Assistant Attorney General.
WILLIAM L. HARPER,
Assistant Attorney General.
ROBERT J. CASTELLANI,
Assistant Attorney General.

[2] Excludes national committee members.
[3] Includes national committee members.
[4] Applying the proviso that "a State shall be entitled to select the same number of individuals to serve as delegates as it was authorized to select for the 1964 convention, the States would send this number of delegates (figures from col. 2J)."

PFC. TIMOTHY S. GUARINO

(Mr. DINGELL asked and was given permission to address the house for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed with a deep sense of honor that I report to the House that a constituent of mine, Pfc. Timothy S. Guarino of the U.S. Marine Corps has been awarded the Navy Cross for extraordinary heroism while on duty in the Republic of Vietnam.

While his unit was under heavy ground attack on June 1, 1969, Private Guarino rescued a wounded companion who was exposed to enemy advance and subsequently saved this same companion and a hospital corpsman from death when he threw himself over them and absorbed the full force of an exploding grenade.

Private Guarino's gallantry in combat action exemplifies the traditions of which the Marine Corps is rightfully proud. But beyond this, Private Guarino's conduct represents the human spirit at its noblest.

I am pleased to be able to report that Private Guarino has recovered in large part from his extensive injuries and has now returned to civilian life. He is currently working full time and attending college during the evening. He plans to become a full-time student this fall.

I know that Private Guarino's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Anthony Guarino, of River Rouge, Mich., are extremely proud of their son. I want them to know that I share that pride, as I feel sure does each Member of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the text of Private Guarino's citation appear at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington.

The President of the United States takes pleasure in presenting the Navy Cross to Private First Class Timothy S. Guarino, United States Marine Corps, for service as set forth in the following.

CITATION

For extraordinary heroism while serving as a Machine Gun Ammunition Man with Company G, Second Battalion, Ninth Marines, Third Marine Division in the Republic of Vietnam on 1 June 1969. Company G came under a vicious ground attack by a determined hostile force utilizing satchel charges, automatic weapons fire and rocket-propelled grenades. While resolutely defending his position in a sector of the perimeter which had been penetrated by the enemy, Private First Class Guarino observed a wounded companion fall in a position dangerously exposed to the enemy advance. Completely disregarding his own safety, he fearlessly crossed the fire-swept area and carried his injured comrade to a place where medical aid was available. As he was assisting in treating the casualty, an enemy hand grenade landed beside the corpsman and the wounded Marine. Fully aware of the possible consequences of his actions and thinking only of the safety of his companion, Private First Class Guarino unhesitatingly knocked the corpsman to the ground beside the wounded Marine and valiantly threw himself over their bodies thus absorbing the full force of the grenade's detonation and sustaining extensive wounds. His heroic and bold efforts inspired all who observed him and saved the lives of two comrades. By his courage, selfless concern for his fellowman and unwavering devotion to duty in the face of grave personal danger Private First Class Guarino upheld the highest traditions of the Marine Corps and the United States Naval Service.

For the President,

JOHN H. CHAFEE,
Secretary of the Navy.

LOW WAGE IMPORTS THREATEN DOMESTIC PRODUCERS

(Mr. MONAGAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MONAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the flow of imports into this country continues to increase with serious effects upon business in our State and in the Nation.

Only recently a local stainless steel flatware company and other U.S. companies lost a very substantial order from a U.S. airline to a Japanese supplier.

The substantially lower foreign wages when added to a technology that is comparable to ours permit the Japanese and other low-wage nations to undersell our own companies in our domestic market.

We have seen similar invasions in rubber footwear, canvas footwear, and pins, to mention just a few other local examples. Nor do the Japanese appear to be responsive to the pleas made to them to modify this tendency by voluntary means. They refer to our legal procedures set up for the imposition of tariffs or quotas and maintain that this procedure should be used.

I again bring this question to the attention of the House because in my judgment it is going to be one of the most serious questions facing the Nation in the months ahead. The trickle of imports which began after the war has now become a flood. Instead of 1 or 2 or 5, the percentage of the domestic market captured by imports in some cases reaches 36 percent and to 56 percent when calculated as a percentage of domestic production.

Clearly a more realistic attitude on the part of those administering our trade programs will be required. Everyone wants to expand trade in a reasonable manner, but an application of these principles without relation to reality and the needs of domestic workers and producers will obviously mean the continued decline if not the demise of some of our industries. In the post-Vietnam period it will be more vital than ever that our industries remain active and productive because the cushion provided by defense industry will be lacking.

I have warned about this trend for many years and we are this year seeing one of the results of it in Naugatuck, Conn., where the competition of imports is one of the reasons why the management of the Uniroyal footwear plant there has indicated possible plans to close the plant.

I have corresponded with President Nixon and his trade representative about these matters, but I can perceive no broad-scale understanding of the threat that these imports pose. I was most interested to see that Senator MUSKIE the other day had called attention to this urgent and difficult problem and predicted that it would be a top source of difficulty in the years ahead. I am glad that he is coming to understand this matter.

I therefore wish to place in the RECORD, as I have already expressed it to the President and his trade representative, my deep concern and my earnest hope that the administration will soon make an overall examination of this problem and initiate a positive policy of defensive action before the invasion of these imports has wrought irreparable damage.

FASCELL BILL TO PROVIDE FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO LOCAL EDUCATIONAL AGENCIES NEEDED TO MEET REQUIREMENTS OF FEDERAL LAW

(Mr. FASCELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, many public school systems throughout our country are presently on the brink of financial disaster. Burgeoning construction, operating, and supply costs coupled with changing economic, social, and demographic conditions have compounded the problem.

Most recently it has become apparent that school systems will have to incur an additional strain as a result of the immediate implementation of desegregation plans.

In enacting the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the Congress anticipated some of the need for Federal assistance by providing technical assistance and training institutes to aid in carrying out desegregation of public education. Such assistance is limited, however, to advising schools on the special educational problems occasioned by desegregation while training institutes are established through grants to, or contracts with, institutions of higher education.

The Congress has, in recent years, concerned itself more and more with the financial crisis of our schools and with the achievement of educational excellence for all students. The impacted area aid program was first established by the 81st Congress to be followed in 1965 by the enactment of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. This latter hallmark legislation was the first attempt to aid all public school systems.

The general authorization for ESEA, however, is not now sufficient to cope with the additional, excessive strains on our school systems. Certainly, the present level of assistance cannot possibly fund the added expenses resulting from the immediate implementation of school desegregation plans.

In many parts of the country, the courts have ruled that public education has remained segregated in clear violation of the intent of the 1954 Brown against Board of Education decision. In recent months, Dade and Orange Counties in my own State of Florida, certain counties in South Carolina and Mississippi, and Los Angeles county in California have been ordered to immediately implement desegration plans. The Board of Education in Los Angeles, for example, estimates that implementation of its proposed desegregation plan would cost in excess of $180 million a year over an 8-year period. In the face of an already financially overburdened educational system, such high additional costs cannot possibly be met without Federal assistance.

It is for this reason, Mr. Speaker, that I am today introducing a bill to remedy the situation. This legislation would authorize the U.S. Commissioner of Education to provide financial assistance to local educational agencies to meet the requirements of law by providing: First, direct grants to individual school districts in order to meet additional administrative expenses; and second, loans at the lowest possible interest rate for the construction of school facilities.

The grants to local educational agencies would be made on the basis of a formula which takes into account the number of children who, as the result of the implementing of a desegregation plan, are attending a public school they would not otherwise have attended; further, there would be a direct allowance to the school system for each teacher reassigned as a result of desegregation efforts.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this legislation is to meet a critical problem confronting one of our most cherished possessions, our educational system. If we are to continue to strive for the educational excellence which has long been our goal, it is essential that this legislation be enacted.

LAREDO SCHOOLS GAIN NATIONAL ACCLAIM FOR DEVELOPING DRUG ABUSE CURRICULUM

(Mr. KAZEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. KAZEN. Mr. Speaker, today's school board members, administrators, and parents, not having faced drug use or abuse as children, cannot comprehend how any child, let alone their own, could become involved with drugs or need to be educated about drug hazards.

All too often a shocked family and a shocked community find out about a local drug problem too late, when a youngster's first experiment with stimulants, depressants or hallucinogens backfires—and becomes his last.

The most effective manner of curtailing and preventing the improper use of dangerous drugs is through an effective and greatly expanded educational program. The Drug Abuse Education Act of 1969 seeks to assist in eliminating the problem of drug abuse by striking at which is essentially the heart of the problem—the lack of knowledge on the dangers of improper drug use.

Long before the Drug Abuse Education Act of 1969 was enacted, the alert citizens of Laredo, Tex., had already organized a committee to develop a curriculum guide expressly dedicated to the purpose of teaching its schoolchildren about the proper use of drugs and the dangers involved in the improper use of drugs and narcotics.

When the Drug Abuse Education Act of 1969 was enacted, the schools of Laredo were prepared and ready to implement a well-organized program of instruction in a unified effort to impart to their children the realization that the thrills and kicks they seek in drugs are not worth the price they will have to pay in crippled minds, broken bodies, shame and degradation.

Recently, the schools of Laredo, Tex., my hometown that previously won national fame and recognition for their outstanding bilingual educational program, have now won national acclaim for having developed a most comprehensive curriculum guide especially designed for the implementation of the Drug Abuse Education Act of 1969.

The school system has developed a sequential, conceptual, multidisciplinary approach type program to be implemented directly into the existing curriculum at all levels—grades 1 through 12. In an effort to present factual, basic information that ultimately will influence the student's total development, each grade level and subject matter is closely interwoven and related.

This pilot project is a most remarkable story of community awareness, civic dedication and cooperation. I take great pride in this remarkable achievement and in the countless hours of volunteer work by the many people involved, such as teachers, school administrators, parents, doctors, pharmacists and many others. Special recognition and credit is due to

Dr. Leo Cigarroa, distinguished physician, civic leader, and school board member; Mr. Vidal Trevino, the assistant school superintendent who also served as chairman of the citizens' coordinating committee on drug abuse; and Mrs. Graciela C. Ramirez, who compiled the final draft of the "Curriculum Guidelines for Drug Education."

The schools of Laredo received national and international publicity through an associated press story written by a most able reporter, Richard Beene. Since this story was published and aired over radio and television, more than 25 States have written the Laredo schools inquiring about this curriculum development.

Articles, with photo coverage, will soon be published in Texas Medicine, publication of the Texas Medical Association, and in the Medical Tribune, a worldwide medical news service publication of New York.

Queries for information and copies of the curriculum guidelines have come from various sources, such as: KGMB–TV of Honolulu, Rockford, Illinois Chamber of Commerce, Louisiana Department of Education, Baton Rouge; New Jersey Regional Drug Abuse Agency, Jersey City, N.J.; Format Productions, Inc., of Hollywood, Calif., who specialize in educational films for small children; Auburn University's Extension Service for Homemaker Clubs, to include programs on drugs in their State program of work; and public schools from Marlborough, Mass., Greenville, Mich., Albert Lea, Minn., and the West Geauga Local Schools of Chesterland, Ohio.

A parent in New York, N.Y., Mrs. Arnold J. Davidson, of 176 East 77th Street, wrote:

> Congratulations on beginning your anti-drug program in the first grade. As an aware and concerned parent, I have been "fighting"—alone—to lower the grade level of the drug education program in our daughter's school.
> I firmly believe that conditioning of the child must take place before the age of experimentation begins. . . .

Mr. Speaker, I think my colleagues would be interested in knowing how all of this was accomplished, so, with your permission, I would like to read the Associated Press story that appeared in the February 25, 1970 edition of the San Antonio Light:

> LAREDO TO BEGIN ANTIDRUG PROGRAM IN PRIMARY SCHOOLS—EXPANSION PLANNED

> First, second and third graders will learn about the enticing bottles in the family medicine cabinet. Fourth through sixth grades will include instruction on the dangers of glue and marijuana.
> The emphasis then will turn to heroin, LSD, amphetamines, barbiturates and related drugs and, as one teacher put it, "whatever else is in vogue."
>
> The pilot project begins with 5,300 pupils and next fall it will include the school districts' 17,000 youngsters.

> The guides "aren't like a Bible to be taught literally word for word," Trevino said.
> "This is not a program for rehabilitation or law enforcement. It's strictly educational. And we don't preach," Trevino emphasized.
>
> The Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) sponsored the planning phase with the $9,000 grant.
>
> Trevino said HEW hopes to print the guidelines drawn up in this grass roots effort and distribute them throughout the nation.
> In time, Trevino said, HEW officials hope also to distribute the guides to 33 foreign countries.
> Trevino and his team of teachers do not expect the project to operate perfectly this spring. They'll spend more months this summer evaluating the project and rewriting the guidelines before introducing the program in all schools here next fall.
>
> Schools in Laredo's sister city across the Rio Grande, Nuevo Laredo, have indicated an interest in the program, Trevino said.
> Why did Laredo schools decide to take on such a project?
>
> It dates back, officials said, to the arrest of a group of Laredo youngsters, including some from prominent families, for smoking marijuana.
> This, coupled with a report from officers that narcotics use is widespread in Laredo schools, led to the formation of a Citizens War Against Narcotics Committee. Planning for the school program soon got under way.
> Trevino notes there are some who feel a drug education program will serve only to encourage young people to experiment with drugs, but he adds:
> "It's all over TV and the papers. They know about LSD, about freaking out. We think that, if we give our youngsters enough information to base their judgments on, they will not use and will not, experiment with narcotics."

FEDERAL PAY BILL

(Mr. DULSKI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and as chairman of the House conferees on H.R. 13000, the broad Federal pay bill passed by the House last October, I would like to make the following report to the Members on the progress of our conference with the Senate counterparts.

We had two meetings with the Senate conferees on Wednesday and another meeting this morning. On Wednesday the conferees from both Houses were in unanimous agreement that any pay bill to be reported by the conference would be retroactive. This is an assurance to the workers of our intention to include a retroactive feature in the bill.

Beyond that agreement, the Senate conferees are unwilling to discuss any of the merits of this legislation which passed the House on October 14, and then was passed by the Senate in greatly modified form on December 12.

The House asked for conference on December 17 and the Senate agreed to a conference on December 18. Until yesterday the conferees had not met on this bill, although as early as February 25, 1970, I keyed the Senate conferees to meet promptly.

In the meeting this morning the Senate conferees maintained their position that they did not want to consider the merits of H.R. 13000 while the negotiations between management and employees were going on downtown.

The House conferees voted yesterday to begin immediate markup of the conference report.

The Senate conferees disagreed, and therefore no markup has begun. In the meeting this morning the House conferees adopted the following motion:

First. The House conferees regret the unwillingness of the Senate conferees to proceed now with markup of H.R. 13000;

Second. In view of this unwillingness, it is the view of the conferees that it is pointless to continue meeting with the Senate conferees at this time;

Third. Therefore, we move that the House conferees adjourn subject to the call of the chairman of the House committee.

For the information of the House, our conferees stand ready to meet at any time to proceed with the markup of this legislation. My House colleagues in the conference feel, as I do, that we should get down to the details of the matters that are within the area of a compromise of the House and Senate versions of H.R. 13000.

I regret that I cannot give my colleagues in the House any indication as to when there will be further meetings by the conference committee.

I also include in my remarks a conference resolution:

CONFERENCE RESOLUTION

The conferees on the part of the Senate propose the following resolution:

Whereas the Postmaster General, by direction of the President, has instituted proceedings for negotiations with representatives of the AFL–CIO postal unions, and

Whereas the representatives of the postal unions have agreed to negotiate with the Postmaster General, and others, and

Whereas any action on pay legislation in the Congress during this period of negotiation would necessarily affect the progress of such negotiations by limiting, outlining, establishing minimum or maximum terms of settlement acceptable to the Congress, or eliminating the necessity for such negotiations, and

Whereas all AFL–CIO postal unions have strongly advocated the enactment of provisions for collective bargaining in the postal service, particularly as incorporated in the labor-management provisions of S. 3613, S. 309, S. 2460, and H.R. 4, and the Postmaster General has approved the terms for collective bargaining incorporated in H.R. 4, therefore

Be it resolved, that the conferees on the part of the Senate specifically commit themselves to the following:

1. Legislation enacted by the Congress for postal pay increases, whether recommended by the President as a result of successful negotiations between the parties or as a result of congressional action independent of such negotiations, will be retroactive in effect to a date not later than the first pay period which occurred on or after January 1, 1970.

2. The Senate conferees will act in conference, or if necessary will recommend to the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and the Senate the immediate enactment of legislation for postal pay increases when (1) the President recommends legislation on the basis of successful negotiations or (2) the parties to the negotiations announce that they agree that they have bargained in good faith with every intention to reach an agreement, and that they are unable to do so.

"TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE"—A MATTER OF WHOSE OX IS POISONED

(Mr. MIKVA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Speaker, we have seen a curious contrast in recent weeks between the Justice Department's and the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration's eagerness to assist Mississippi State College and its apparent failure to provide comparable assistance in solving the cases of mysterious poisoning of livestock on privately owned farms in Alabama. One would think that the Department of Justice and LEAA would be equally zealous to assist blacks in the South seeking the law's protection as they are to enforce the law against them; but that does not seem to be the case.

One need not embrace the Black Muslim philosophy in order to believe that citizens of this Nation are entitled to the protection of the laws whatever their skin color. That, I take it, is what "equal protection" in the 14th amendment is supposed to mean. One would like to see the Justice Department move with the same alacrity it showed at Mississippi State to provide "technical assistance" to black citizens of Alabama whose property is being systematically destroyed.

One of the quickest ways to undermine respect for law—or for law and order for those who prefer that phrase—is to demonstrate to the citizenry that law enforcement or nonenforcement depends on who you are, what your color is, or who you know. I have written to the Attorney General to ask for details of the Department of Justice's involvement in the Mississippi State College incident. I think the disparity between the Department's and LEAA's actions in that case and their failure to act or even investigate the racially motivated incidents in Alabama is a sad commentary on law and order in the Department of Justice.

ROGERS SAYS PREVENTIVE MEDICINE SHOULD BE PROVIDED TO YOUNG PEOPLE, TOO

(Mr. ROGERS of Florida asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I read with interest that the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare was proposing a third part of medicare in the area of preventive medicine. I certainly think that it is about time HEW take a course that will keep people out of the hospital instead of spending all its efforts on curing people after they have suffered illness.

But I find it ironic that at a time when HEW is proposing preventive medicine for those of our citizens over 65 HEW is trying to cut out or reduce preventive medicine for the young citizens of our country.

Mr. Speaker, almost without exception, communicable diseases in the United States are raising alarmingly. Unfortunately, most people think that plain measles is only a discomfort. And although most people now realize that German measles can have a terrible effect on the unborn if an expectant mother contacts it, most people here too do not realize the consequences.

But to dispel this notion, I would like to note just a few of the very frightening effects that "plain measles" will have on our population during the period between March 6 and June 30 of this year.

In the age range of 1 to 12, there is expected to be 267,320 cases, of which 1,254 children will be hospitalized for 11,818 days.

In addition to this expense, one out of every 100, or about 267, will contract encephalitis. There will be an estimated 88 persons rendered retarded. And 27 children will die. The cost in money is estimated at $13,131,000. But this cannot be compared with the death and the permanent disabling effect that this will have. And this is plain measles—common measles. Preventable measles.

Tabulation of reported common measles in this country of the 1969–70 season thus far compared with the 1968–69 season show a general increase in the country of 112 percent.

Yet the administration has testified that H.R. 11913, which I have introduced, is not necessary nor desirable. The administration is apparently willing to incorporate the communicable disease functions into the Partnership for Health Act, but without proper funding to carry the program which we have started to a proper conclusion.

Yet we see that Rubeola measles, the common measles, is up 114 percent.

Rubella measles—German—is up 82 percent.

Mumps is up 14 percent and diphtheria is up 254 percent.

TB is increasing also.

These are preventable diseases. And, they are killers and maiming diseases which cost the American public in lives and millions of dollars each year.

I am certainly for the administration's theory of preventive medicine for those over 65, but I think the administration is completely wrongheaded in limiting preventive medicine to one segment of our society.

Our children should be given all the medical care possible when we have the solution to disease. The administration should not adopt such a posture of being only half safe.

I call on the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, as he considers preventive medicine for the elderly, to change his policy of denying preventive medicine in the young.

GOLDEN EAGLE

(Mr. EDMONDSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Speaker, this morning the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs reported a very substantially modified version of the bill S. 2315—the so-called golden eagle legislation about which many Members have been getting a good deal of mail. The committee I believe very wisely concluded that the extension should be only for approximately 20 months to permit a review of the procedures being used. The committee also very wisely concluded that to continue the status quo with regard to the Army Engineers reservoirs, which means that the provisions of the Flood Control Act of 1968 will continue to prevent any entrance or admission fees at these multipurpose reservoir recreational areas.

On a 9-to-9 tie vote the committee failed to adopt the amendment which

I offered which would have extended the prohibition as to entrance and admission fees to the reclamation projects in the country and also to our national forest recreational areas.

The committee on a very close vote turned down another amendment which would have prevented an increase in this golden eagle of 43 percent, from $7 to $10.

These matters will be brought to the floor of the House by a number of us on the committee who believe that this is not time to raise the charge for this fee while it is under study and who believe that the prohibition of entrance and admission fees should be extended to our reclamation areas and our national forests.

THE NURSING-HOME INDUSTRY

(Mr. BRINKLEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Speaker, the following letter from a dedicated, sincere constituent places the nursing-home picture in better perspective. Those of us who know the principals involved recognize and attribute to them the utmost of good faith. Yet, reasonable men will surely agree that the deficiencies found in some institutions do not justify a blanket indictment against all nursing homes.

It is a pleasure to contribute the following letter toward a more complete picture of this humane industry. Both the writer and I would be among the first to join in efforts for improved quality in any substandard nursing homes nationwide.

The nursing homes found in the third district of Georgia would be good models to study and to follow.

The letter follows and I commend it to the attention of all Members:

Congressman JACK BRINKLEY,
Congress of the United States, Cannon House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BRINKLEY: It is a shame that people are unaware of the one industry in this Country that has moved faster and more efficiently to meet a critical social need than any other in history. For your information, I submit to you comments on the various points of a recent news release made by one of your colleagues.

1. The Gentleman stated he had been shaving "old men" but criticized a home that had their maintenance man shaving patients. Small nursing homes usually have employees doing various jobs ranging from assisting with patients to housekeeping to light maintenance work. For the rates we charge, small homes cannot afford to employ maintenance people that do nothing except maintenance. In an effort to cut costs, our orderlies help with painting, plumbing repairs and yard work when they finish their orderly duties. I believe that these people are as competent to shave patients as is your colleague.

2. The Gentleman says he only found two homes out of twelve he visited to which he would send his mother, and he could not afford either of them. The only way a home can provide luxurious surroundings and sophisticated care is to have income sufficient to cover the expense of this kind of service. We in the industry would like nothing better than to be able to provide service normally enjoyed only by royalty and the wealthy—but such services cost money.

Since the nursing home industry depends so much on tax funds, I think the industry's and the government's goal should be to provide adequate care in buildings constructed of materials and to standards equal to residences of middle income families in America. I cannot see spending $20,000 per bed for nursing home construction as does the Hill-Burton program when perfectly adequate facilities such as the one I am building in Columbus, Georgia and the one I have in Montezuma, Georgia can be provided for $7,000 per bed. Can the taxpayers of America really afford to provide elderly Americans with mansions in which to live? I say no. They do not expect it. There is already enough waste in government, and Congressmen should be looking for ways to hold spending in line with the needs of the people, and not seek to overspend in areas that do not benefit the recipients of these services.

3. Nursing homes have a responsibility to provide adequate care to those entrusted to them. The example of a mother writing a wistful letter to her son saying she desired to be closer to him is in no way a reflection on the nursing home. This is a personal family problem that cannot be solved by the nursing home. Does the Congressman feel the home should put this patient on a plane or bus and send her to California? Its responsibility is to care for her as long as the family desires.

4. His quote of a statement made by an attendant is regrettable. It is difficult to get the large number of employees in nursing homes to all speak and do as the administrators or owners would like. Our employees are no different from the store clerk that tells a disgruntled customer that he should take his business elsewhere, even though the owner of the store would certainly have a different attitude. This is a problem that comes from employing people that are not unique to the nursing home field. I doubt that the owner of the nursing home in which the attendant allegedly made this statement about a "little heart attack" and "hating to disturb the doctor on Sunday" shares the same opinion as his employee. This could just as likely happen in a Hill-Burton nursing home as in one privately owned.

5. I feel the government should continuously study all areas of life in these United States. However, I do think there exists enough sources of information regarding the nursing home industry including government agencies and trade associations to provide the Congress with what it needs without spending additional millions on investigations. If Congress feels it can spend more in this field, spend it on the patients, not on more reports, documents and government employees. One of the main problems with the Medicare Program is that most of the money spent on extended care patients goes to government agencies, intermediaries, such as Blue Cross, for personnel to assemble and complete the ridiculous amount of paper work required on every patient that utilizes services offered by Medicare. I say eliminate all these unnecessary middle men between the U.S. Treasury and the patient and let these dollars benefit the patient.

6. In a television interview I heard the Congressman say he thought nursing homes should be non-profit—that this would more directly benefit the patients of nursing homes. The fact is, non-profit nursing homes have rates just as high if not higher than do profit-making ones, and the ones I have visited provide no more services. Here in Georgia, the most expensive nursing homes as far as the taxpayers are concerned are the State operated and the County operated Hill-Burton facilities. Such homes are no better staffed or operated than most privately-owned homes, including my own.

7. He says "stock in these establishments is doing very well on the securities market." This is true, but it is due to promotion work by the stock brokers and on a false belief that the public has of the nursing home industry. Because of its rapid growth in recent years, the public believes it to be a high-profit industry. This is not true, and an investigation into these large chains and public companies will prove it. I have never known one to pay a dividend and stocks have sold for as high as 50 times earnings. No one has to tell you that this is not a good investment. When people see new buildings going up and witness thousands of people being served, they automatically assume it is a big money maker. Most of us that own and administer our own homes make a small return on our investment. And why shouldn't we? These people buying stocks from the exchanges are going to lose their shirts; they are the ones that are going to get hurt in all this sudden growth, not the patient. The managers of nursing homes will continue to provide the services being purchased by the patient as efficiently as possible. However, no matter how efficient his operation, he will still have a difficult time having money left over that he can call profit.

8. It is hard to believe a Congressman would admit, as this one did in the news article, that he has been very quiet since being in Congress but now is ready for a fight. His whole motive in attacking the nursing home industry seems to be calculated toward blowing his own horn. He has managed to make the newspapers, but it's a shame he chose to do it in a fashion that could hurt a lot of honest, hard-working businessmen trying to provide a worthwhile service to mankind in a free enterprise system that believes itself to be more efficient and having less selfish desires than would a government agency trying to provide the same service.

My hope is that you can convince the rest of Congress that most of this industry is made up of honest, hard-working taxpayers doing the best they know how on the money that's available. What else can be asked?

Very truly yours,

R. DEAN FOWLER.

JUDGE CARSWELL

(Mr. RARICK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RARICK. Mr. Speaker, we are witnessing a skillfully managed attack on Judge Carswell, the latest appointee to the Supreme Court, primarily because he is a southerner and a free man.

Judge Carswell is free of any suspicion of conflict of interest or of improper conduct; he has no financial holdings of significance, and is not a wealthy man. The only rallying call for his attackers is that he belongs to an all-white country club and that several of his judicial decisions were reversed.

If this attack succeeds, then no American who is a member of the Masonic Order, Knights of Columbus, Moose, or any other fraternal organization, even B'nai B'rith, can be considered qualified for a position in our Government. All of these clubs are about as integrated as Sweden.

The reversal of this judge's decisions by the present fifth circuit court or the present Supreme Court are to his credit.

The simple truth is that the Communist-coined trigger word "racist" has been very effectively used to stifle free speech and to confuse reasoning and destroy logic.

If this second southern judge is rejected, it can only be because of the true racism demonstrated by his antagonists. In which case, the South should then take notice that taxation without representation has returned.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

(Mr. NICHOLS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last week I was in my home district on official business. Had I been present on that day I would have voted "yea" on the passage of the bill H.R. 16196, the District of Columbia Crime and Criminal Procedures Act, and I ask that the RECORD so indicate.

LEGISLATION DESIGNED TO SOLVE THE GROWING PROBLEM OF BOMBINGS AND BOMB THREATS INTRODUCED

(Mr. McCULLOCH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced legislation designed to solve the growing problem of bombings and bomb threats that have sprung up across this Nation.

This bill would strengthen the existing Federal law contained in 18 U.S.C. 837 regulating the transportation and use of explosives in the following ways:

First. The definition of "explosive" would be expanded to include certain incendiary devices such as Molotov cocktails.

Second. The maximum penalties for illegal transportation of explosives in interstate commerce would be increased to a term of up to 10 years or a fine of up to $10,000. If personal injury resulted from a later explosion these penalties would be doubled and, if death resulted, the penalty might be as much as a life sentence or death.

Third. The penalty for willfully making a false bomb threat would be raised to a maximum of 5 years imprisonment and a $5,000 fine.

Fourth. The following would be made new Federal crimes: malicious bombing of Federal premises, unauthorized possession of explosives in Federal buildings, malicious bombing of businesses and commercial establishments and possession of explosives with knowledge or intent that such explosives will be transported or used in violation of any other provision of the bill.

The bill further provides that the Attorney General, or an Assistant Attorney General designated by the Attorney General, must personally authorize any investigation of possible violations or prosecution therefor on the basis of his judgment that such investigation or prosecution is in the public interest.

Mr. Speaker, I most strongly condemn the many senseless bombings that have taken place. Buildings and personal property have been needlessly destroyed. Some citizens have lost businesses, which they took an entire lifetime to build up. But most outrageous of all is the resulting loss of human life and infliction of physical injuries—usually on innocent bystanders who just happened to be in the wrong place at the wrong time.

Many of the people who commit these violent attacks on society actually seek the destruction of society itself. For us to allow this outrageous action to continue without taking prompt action to stop it would be to abandon to anarchy the Nation that our forefathers have taken 200 years to build.

We must resolve to put an end to this reign of terror and destruction in our midst. I therefore urge that the Congress give prompt and favorable consideration to this most important and necessary legislation.

But we must do more than just outlaw bomb throwing, Mr. Speaker. We must attack the underlying causes of this antisocial conduct. It is not enough merely to treat the symptom; we must cure the disease.

We must give hope to the disaffected, the young, the poor, the black. For it is these people who, when they have lost all hope in the establishment and the system, begin to think of bombs and revolution.

We must insure that all Americans, black as well as white, poor as well as rich, enjoy free and equal access to the ballot box, decent housing, opportunities for meaningful employment and quality education for their children. We must bring our young people more into the mainstream of society through such things as more realistic drug laws, a more equitable draft system and, most important, achievement of President Nixon's goal of a speedy and honorable end to American military involvement in Vietnam. Action of this nature was eloquently advocated by two Presidential Commissions which have submitted final reports within the last 2 years.

In short, Mr. Speaker, we must build a better, freer, a more just society in which all Americans can find a place within the system. And if we do this, few people will then want to blow it up.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 2 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill that I have just introduced.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, in light of the recent terror tactics committed throughout the United States, President Nixon has proposed the enactment of more stringent legislation to eliminate the threat to life and private property as well as to our Federal buildings and public property. I am happy to cosponsor this proposal in the House of Representatives. This bill would have the effect of strengthening the penalties for violation of the law and include prohibition of additional explosives, specifically incendiary devices. Perhaps even more significantly, however, the bill would expand the reach of the law to use and possession of explosives to damage or destroy Federal property. The law which it would amend presently deals with use and possession incident to interstate commerce.

Our great institutions have always been subject to change by consensus. This, in fact, is the strength of our system. We must not, however, allow these institutions to be intimidated and subjected to terror tactics with the goal of subversion and eventual violent overthrow. I feel that this bill will serve to protect these institutions which were designed to secure our individual liberties.

We must not delay in this legislation while public property is being destroyed, while our Government buildings are being subjected to bomb threats, while lives are being lost, while our citizens feel the threat of anarchistic terrorism. The criminal element must experience swift and effective opposition to insure that public safety is once again restored as an integral entity of the society we expect and shall have.

FARM SUBSIDY PAYMENTS

(Mr. CONTE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I hope at a later date to offer my $20,000 agriculture subsidy limitation, or some other type of limitation, which will bring some sanity to our scandalous farm program.

Twice, this House passed my amendment to limit farm payments to $20,000, which would have saved the taxpayers $300,000,000 annually.

I have submitted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a table listing all farmers who received more than $25,000 in farm payments for 1969, beginning on page 9129 to 9163, No. 46, part II, Tuesday, March 24, 1970, reads like a Montgomery Ward catalog.

The entire list amounts to an incredible scandal sheet, clearly demonstrating the bankruptcy of our farm program. These farm payments went to a very strange collection of recipients, including State governments. Montana collected $641,341; Washington, $171,781 for not planting.

State prisons: Arizona, $148,628; Louisiana, $85,219; Texas, $82,155. Seven corporations over $1 million: Burwill, $4,370,657; Standard Oil, $127,995.

In the face of this massive evidence of inexcusable waste, I was extremely disappointed that Agriculture Secretary Clifford M. Hardin has given no indication that he is prepared to put an end to these giveaways. In testimony last Monday before the Senate Agriculture Committee, Hardin told Louisiana's Senator ELLENDER and his colleagues that the administration is willing to commit itself to substantially the same high payment program for the next 3 years in order to see the new administration farm bill enacted.

While I am sure this is good news to Mississippi's Senator EASTLAND, who picked up $146,792 in 1969, $30,000 better than his 1968 record, I can assure the Secretary that the Congress and the American people will no longer stand for it. With millions of Americans still suffering from hunger and malnutrition, the time has come to apply the brakes on this runaway program and redirect these funds to more pressing domestic needs.

UTAH'S SIGNIFICANT DRUG USE STUDY UNDERSCORES NEED FOR SOUND CONGRESSIONAL ACTION

(Mr. LLOYD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I doubt that anyone in this House will question the statement that drug abuse, particularly among our young people, has increased dramatically in the last 2 years. This increase has come in the fact of strict laws forbidding the possession and sale of narcotics and dangerous drugs. These laws are the object of ridicule for the growing number of drug abusers, many of them more sophisticated about drugs than their parents.

We hear so much about drug abuse and drug addiction that we become numbed and even blase. Statistics on drug addiction among our children no longer shock us. But last week the problem was made frighteningly real to me when I talked with William S. Mole and Bruce Woolley, chairman and executive secretary of the Governor's Citizen Advisory Committee on Drugs in Utah. For 6 months in 1969 the committee conducted surveys and studied on drug abuse in Utah. They summarized their findings in an excellent report to the Governor submitted last winter.

The committee's report was divided into seven major sections: extent of drug abuse, drug traffic, law enforcement, education, rehabilitation, and church and civic involvement.

The committee found that drugs were generally available in every part of the State. In Salt Lake County an area of recognized high moral and religious standards there is no junior or senior high school that has not had drugs. The Salt Lake County Detention Center rarely saw a drug user prior to 1966; now they cannot keep an accurate record of the drug users entering the center.

Educators and law-enforcement officials estimated that about 30 to 50 percent of the high school population had had experience with at least one kind of drug. Extensive surveys among the students showed that 12 to 13 percent had tried drugs, but both users and nonusers believed that figure to be low.

The age of drug abusers is dropping. Arrests have been made in the sixth grade for possession of marihuana. The number of drug abusers below age 13 is increasing. Economic status is no deterrent to obtaining drugs and youngsters of all economic levels are involved. The committee reports that it is frequently the more intelligent and inquisitive young people who become involved in drugs. And there are few, if any, motivational factors for the drug users to seek treatment. They consider the drug a source of pleasure and have no desire to be rid of that pleasure.

The committee reports:

> Legal controls have not resulted in the desired effect in many instances There seems to be a generally negative attitude toward law enforcement and statutes surrounding drug abuse. . . .
> Drug traffic occurs right on the streets, yet, for the majority of the public, everything appears to be normal. For this reason, most of the drug offenders look upon our "straight" society with contempt and ridicule for its unenforceable laws and its naivete.

The main laws on drug control in Utah are contained in two spearate acts, the Uniform Narcotic Drug Act and the drug abuse control law. The committee found these laws as amended to be among the most progressive in the Nation. However, committee members heard evidence that law enforcement agencies are frustrated in their efforts to enforce laws as they are currently written. Drug abuse laws are scattered throughout the Utah statutes and need to be condensed into one comprehensive bill. With our present laws the use of fraudulent prescriptions is a felony under one statute and a misdemeanor under another. Such discrepancies need to be reconciled and placed in a single law that is manageable by law enforcement officials.

In the area of law enforcement the committee found that limited law enforcement manpower, training, finances, and seemingly lax courts were hindering the effective enforcement of drug laws. In addition, the committee found a general apathy and indifference on the part of most of the public. It said:

> A complacent "it can't happen here" attitude exists in many segments of the State. A large number of parents do not know what to look for, and refuse to acknowledge the possibility that their child is involved. Young drug abusers are accepted by their peers.
> The martyr attitude of drug users makes them willing to fill the jails and be the recipients of severe punishment for what to them appears to be a just cause. There are probably no other serious types of offenses in which persons involved are so obviously engaged in advocating use or participation by other people.

The committee found that there was no comprehensive education program on drug abuse involving most of the high schools and grades below the high schools. Drug education is supposed to be covered in a health class required for graduation from high school. However, the committee found that large numbers of students have substituted physiology or an allied science for the health course and have, therefore, never been exposed to any kind of drug education. The committee reported:

> There is no centralized agency or standardized program for accumulating and screening proper education material for training of teachers, informing the public, educating church and civic groups, and implementing a statewide program against drug abuse. Comprehensive courses are not now being presented to students at low enough grade levels. Instruction in this field should commence at least in the fifth grade and continue through the junior and senior high schools.

The committee found not only a lack of drug education programs but also a lack of rehabilitation facilities for drug users. There is no State-sponsored center for the rehabilitation of the heavy drug user, the weekender, the experimenter, or even for education and prevention of the potential user. Community centers and neighborhood programs are wholly inadequate. The committee found a lack of sustained effort by civic and church groups in carrying out drug education and rehabilitation programs. However, the committee noted that these groups do recognize the existence of a drug problem and given proper guidance are willing to work to combat it.

The committee concluded that Utah does in fact have a serious drug abuse problem of sufficient proportions to warrant immediate action to curtail its expansion. The committee report contained recommendations for a comprehensive program of education, prevention, law enforcement, and rehabilitation. Some of their recommendations have already gone into effect. The Utah Institute of Drug Problems has been conducting 18-hour courses on drug abuse in the major communities of Utah. This summer Utah educators will go through an intensive 2-week course on drug abuse. And as of next fall, comprehensive courses on drug abuse will be conducted in every school in Utah.

We are lucky in Utah. Our drug problem is still in an early stage. We still have a chance to educate our young people about the dangers of drug abuse before they become drug users. Utah is taking the first steps to control the spread of drug abuse before drug abuse controls Utah's young people.

We in the House have a responsibility to help Utah and all the other States who are desperately trying to control drug abuse. Our Federal laws on narcotics and dangerous drugs are unrealistically harsh and antiquated. The Senate has already recognized the need for drug law reform and passed the Controlled Dangerous Substances Act of 1969. It is now left to the House to act on its own drug control legislation. But we must do it soon. The health and well-being of our children depend on it.

PRINCIPLES OF THE ADMINISTRATION IN DEALING WITH PROBLEMS OF DESEGREGATION

(Mr. GERALD R. FORD was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD, and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. GERALD R. FORD. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States has submitted to the Congress and to the American people a most unusual document—a statement of the principles to which his administration will adhere in dealing with the problems of desegregation. This is an historic and extraordinary document, one which deserves the widest possible circulation.

In his statement, the President has provided us with a most helpful review of judicial rulings on the subject of segregation. He has also reaffirmed his own personal belief that the 1954 Supreme Court decision in Brown against Board of Education was "right in both constitutional and human terms." In other words, the President has made it unmistakably clear that he will carry out the mandate of the Supreme Court regarding segregation in the schools.

The President's statement is remarkable for its forthrightness in that the President emphatically sets forth his opposition to "compulsory busing of pupils beyond normal geographic school zones for the purpose of achieving racial balance." While opposing compulsory busing, the President also states most unequivocally that he is "dedicated to continued progress toward a truly desegregated public school system." He makes the point that there are other ways of achieving desegregation than by the massive busing of students to schools far from their homes.

I think the President has done much to clarify the situation regarding desegregation questions. He makes it plain that Federal officials are to concern themselves only with de jure segregation, not with de facto segregation—and that this dictum holds true both North and South. He also lays down the guideline that—

Federal officials should not go beyond the requirements of law in attempting to impose their own judgment on the local school district.

Mr. Speaker, the President's statement should go far toward clearing away much of the confusion that exists on desegregation in the country today. I commend a reading of it to all Americans. The President's statement follows:

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT ON ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

My purpose in this statement is to set forth in detail this Administration's policies on the subject of desegregation of America's elementary and secondary schools

Few public issues are so emotionally charged as that of school desegregation, few so wrapped in confusion and clouded with misunderstanding. None is more important to our national unity and progress.

This issue is not partisan. It is not sectional. It is an American issue, of direct and immediate concern to every citizen.

I hope that this statement will reduce the prevailing confusion and will help place public discussion of the issue on a more rational and realistic level in all parts of the nation. It is time to strip away the hypocrisy, the prejudice and the ignorance that too long have characterized discussion of this issue.

My specific objectives in this statement are:

—To reaffirm my personal belief that the 1954 decision of the Supreme Court in Brown v. Board of Education was right in both Constitutional and human terms.

—To assess our progress in the 16 years since Brown and to point the way to continuing progress.

—To clarify the present state of the law, as developed by the courts and the Congress, and the Administration policies guided by it.

—To discuss some of the difficulties encountered by courts and communities as desegregation has accelerated in recent years, and to suggest approaches that can mitigate such problems as we complete the process of compliance with Brown.

—To place the question of school desegregation in its larger context, as part of America's historic commitment to the achievement of a free and open society.

Anxiety over this issue has been fed by many sources.

On the one hand, some have interpreted various Administration statements and actions as a backing away from the principle of Brown—and have therefore feared that the painstaking work of a decade and a half might be undermined. We are not backing away. The Constitutional mandate will be enforced.

On the other hand, several recent decisions by lower courts have raised widespread fears that the nation might face a massive disruption of public education: that wholesale compulsory busing may be ordered and the neighborhood school virtually doomed. A comprehensive review of school desegregation cases indicates that these latter are untypical decisions, and that the prevailing trend of judicial opinion is by no means so extreme.

Certain changes are needed in the nation's approach to school desegregation. It would be remarkable if sixteen years of hard, often tempestuous experience had not taught us something about how better to manage the task with a decent regard for the legitimate interests of all concerned—and especially the children. Drawing on this experience, I am confident the remaining problems can be overcome.

WHAT THE LAW REQUIRES

In order to determine what ought to be done, it is important first to be as clear as possible about what must be done.

We are dealing fundamentally with inalienable human rights, some of them constitutionally protected. The final arbiter of of Constitutional questions is the United States Supreme Court.

The President's responsibility

There are a number of questions involved in the school controversy on which the Supreme Court has not yet spoken definitively. Where it has spoken, its decrees are the law. Where it has not spoken, where Congress has not acted, and where differing lower courts have left the issue in doubt, my responsibilities as Chief Executive make it necessary that I determine, on the basis of my best judgment, what must be done.

In reaching that determination, I have sought to ascertain the prevailing judicial view as developed in decisions by the Supreme Court and the various Circuit Courts of Appeals. In this statement I list a number of principles derived from that prevailing judicial view. I accept those principles and shall be guided by them. The Departments and agencies of the Government will adhere to them.

A few recent cases in the low courts have gone beyond those generally accepted principles. Unless affirmed by the Supreme Court, I will not consider them as precedents to guide Administration policy elsewhere.

What the Supreme Court has said

To determine the present state of the law, we must first remind ourselves of the recent history of Supreme Court rulings in this area.

This begins with the Brown case in 1954, when the Court laid down the principle that deliberate segregation of students by race in the public schools was unconstitutional. In that historic ruling, the court gave legal sanction to two fundamental truths—that separation by law establishes schools that are inherently unequal, and that a promise of equality before the law cannot be squared with use of the law to establish two classes of people, one black and one white.

The Court requested further argument, however, and propounded the following questions, among others:

"Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment

"a. would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or

"b. may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?"

In its second Brown decision the following year, the Court addressed itself to these questions of manner and timing of compliance. Its ruling included these principles:

—Local school problems vary: school authorities have the primary responsibility for solving these problems; courts must consider whether these authorities are acting in good faith.

—The courts should be guided by principles of equity, which traditionally are characterized by a practical flexibility in shaping its remedies and by a facility for adjusting and reconciling public and private needs."

—Compliance must be achieved "with all deliberate speed," including "a prompt and reasonable start" toward achieving full compliance "at the earliest practicable date."

In 1964, the Supreme Court spoke again: "The time for mere 'deliberate speed' has run out, and that phrase can no longer justify denying these . . . children their constitutional rights."

At the same time, Congress also added to the impetus of desegregation by passing the Civil Rights Act of 1964, an Act that as a private citizen I endorsed and supported.

Although the Supreme Court in the Brown cases concerned itself primarily, if not exclusively, with pupil assignments, its decree applied also to teacher asisgnments and school facilities as a whole.

In 1968, the Supreme Court reiterated the principle enunciated in prior decisions, that teacher assignments are an important aspect of the basic task of achieving a public school system wholly freed from racial discrimination. During that same year, in another group of Supreme Court decisions, a significant and new set of principles also emerged.

—That a school board must establish "that its proposed plan promises meaningful and immediate progress toward disestablishing State-imposed segregation," and that the plan must "have real prospects for dismantling the State-imposed dual system 'at the earliest practicable date.'"

—That one test of whether a school board has met its "affirmative duty to take whatever steps might be necessary to convert to a unitary system in which racial discrimination would be eliminated root and branch" is the extent to which racial separation persists under its plan.

—That the argument that effective desegregation might cause white families to flee the neighborhood cannot be used to sustain devices designed to perpetuate segregation.

—That when geographic zoning is combined with "free transfers," and the effect of the transfer privilege is to perpetuate segregation despite the zoning, the plan is unacceptable.

The most recent decisions by the Supreme Court have now rejected any further delay, adding to the Court's mandate:

—"The obligation of every school district is to terminate dual systems at once and to operate now and hereafter only unitary schools."

—That the obligation of such districts is an affirmative one and not a passive one.

—That freedom of choice plans could no longer be considered as an appropriate substitute for the affirmative obligation imposed by the Court unless they, in fact, discharge that obligation immediately.

The Court has dealt only in very general terms with the question of what constitutes a "unitary" system, referring to it as one "within which no person is to be effectively excluded from any school because of race or color." It has not spoken definitely on whether or not, or the extent to which, "desegregation" may mean "integration."

In an opinion earlier this month, Chief Justice Burger pointed out a number of "basic practical problems" which the Court had not yet resolved, "including whether, as a Constitutional matter, any particular racial balance must be achieved in the schools; to what extent school districts and zones may or must be altered as a Constitutional matter; to what extent transportation may or must be provided to achieve the ends sought by prior holdings of this Court."

One of these areas of legal uncertainty cited by Chief Justice Burger—school transportation—involves Congressional pronouncements.

In the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the Congress stated, ". . . nothing herein shall empower any official or court of the United States to issue any order seeking to achieve a racial balance in any school by requiring the transportation of pupils or students from one school to another or one school district to another in order to achieve such racial balance, or otherwise enlarge the existing power of the court to insure compliance with constitutional standards."

In the 1966 amendments to the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, the Congress further stated, ". . . nothing contained in this Act shall . . . require the assignment or transportation of students or teachers in order to overcome racial imbalance."

I am advised that these provisions cannot constitutionally be applied to de jure segregation. However, not all segregation as it exists today is de jure.

I have consistently expressed my opposition to any compulsory busing of pupils beyond normal geographic school zones for the purpose of achieving racial balance.

What the lower courts have said

In the absence of definitive Supreme Court rulings, these and other "basic practical problems" have been left for case-by-case determination in the lower courts—and both real and apparent contradictions among some of these lower court rulings have generated considerable public confusion about what the law really requires.

In an often-cited case in 1955 (Briggs v. Elliott), a District Court held that "the Constitution . . . does not require integration. . . . It merely forbids the use of governmental power to enforce segregation."

But in 1966 another court took issue with this doctrine, pointing out that it had been used as justifying "techniques for perpetuating school segregation," and declaring that: ". . . the only adequate redress for a previously overt system-wide policy of segregation directed against Negroes as a collective entity is a system-wide policy of integration."

In 1969, the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals declared: "The famous Briggs v. Elliott dictum—adhered to by this court for many years—that the Constitution forbids segregation but does not require integration . . . is now dead."

Cases in two circuit courts have held that the continued existence of some all-black schools in a formerly segregated district did not demonstrate unconstitutionality, with one noting that there is "no duty to balance the races in the school system in conformity with some mathematical formula."

Another circuit court decision declared zones were based on objective, non-racial criteria, the fact that they failed to produce any significant degree of integration meant that they were unconstitutional.

Two very recent Federal court decisions continue to illustrate the range of opinion: a plan of a southern school district has been upheld even though three schools would remain all-black, but a northern school system has been ordered by another Federal court to integrate all of its schools completely "by the revising of boundary lines for attendance purposes as well as busing so as to achieve maximum racial integration."

This range of differences demonstrates that lawyers and judges have honest disagreements about what the law requires. There have been some rulings that would divert such huge sums of money to non-educational purposes, and would create such severe dislocations of public school systems, as to impair the primary function of providing a good education. In one, for example—probably the most extreme judicial decree so far—a California State court recently ordered the Los Angeles School Board to establish a virtually uniform racial balance throughout its 711 square mile district, with its 775,000 children in 561 schools. Local leaders anticipate that this decree would impose an expenditure of $40,000,000 over the next school year to lease 1,600 buses, to acquire site locations to house them, to hire drivers, and to defray operating costs. Subsequent costs would approximate $20,000,000 annually. Some recent rulings by federal district courts applicable to other school districts appear to be no less severe.

I am dedicated to continued progress toward a truly desegregated public school system. But, considering the always heavy demands for more school operating funds, I believe it is preferable, when we have to make the choice, to use limited financial resources for the improvement of education—for better teaching facilities, better methods, and advanced educational materials—and for the upgrading of the disadvantaged areas in the community rather than buying buses, tires and gasoline to transport young children miles away from their neighborhood schools.

What most of the courts agree on

Despite the obvious confusion, a careful survey of rulings both by the Supreme Court and by the Circuit Courts of Appeals suggests that the basic judicial approach may be more reasonable than some have feared. Whatever a few lower courts might have held to the contrary, the prevailing trend of judicial opinion appears to be summed up in these principles:

—There is a fundamental distinction between so-called "de jure" and "de facto" segregation: de jure segregation arises by law or by the deliberate act of school officials and is unconstitutional; de facto segregation results from residential housing patterns and does not violate the Constitution. (The clearest example of de jure segregation is the dual school system as it existed in the South prior to the decision in Brown—two schools, one Negro and one White, comprised of the same grades and serving the same geographical area. This is the system with which most of the decisions, and the Supreme Court cases up until now, have been concerned.)

—Where school boards have demonstrated a good-faith effort to comply with court rulings, the courts have generally allowed substantial latitude as to method—often making the explicit point that administrative choices should, wherever possible, be made by the local school authorities themselves.

—In devising particular plans, questions of cost, capacity, and convenience for pupils and parents are relevant considerations.

—Whatever the racial composition of student bodies, faculties and staff must be assigned in a way that does not contribute to identifying a given school as "Negro" or "White."

—In school districts that previously operated dual systems, affirmative steps toward integration are a key element in disestablishing the dual system. This positive integration, however, does not necessarily have to result in "racial balance" throughout the system. When there is racial separation in housing, the Constitutional requirement has been held satisfied even though some schools remained all-black.

—While the dual school system is the most obvious example, de jure segregation is also found in more subtle forms. Where authorities have deliberately drawn attendance zones or chosen school locations for the express purpose of creating and maintaining racially separate schools, de jure segregation is held to exist. In such a case the school board has a positive duty to remedy it. This is so even though the board ostensibly operates a unitary system.

—In determining whether school authorities are responsible for existing racial separation—and thus whether they are Constitutionally required to remedy it—the intent of their action in locating schools, drawing zones, etc., is a crucial factor.

—In the case of genuine de facto segregation (i.e., where housing patterns produce substantially all-Negro or all-White schools, and where this racial separation has not been caused by deliberate official action) school authorities are not Constitutionally required to take any positive steps to correct the imbalance.

To summarize: There is a Constitutional mandate that dual school systems and other forms of de jure segregation be eliminated totally. But within the framework of that requirement an area of flexibility—a "rule of reason"—exists, in which school boards, acting in good faith, can formulate plans of desegregation which best suit the needs of their own localities.

De facto segregation, which exists in many areas both North and South, is undesirable but is not generally held to violate the Constitution. Thus, residential housing patterns may result in the continued existence of some all-Negro schools even in a system which fully meets Constitutional standards. But in any event, local school officials may, if they so choose, take steps beyond the Constitutional minimums to diminish racial separation.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION TODAY

The progress

Though it began slowly, the momentum of school desegregation has become dramatic.

Thousands of school districts throughout the South have met the requirements of law.

In the past year alone, the number of black children attending southern schools held to be in compliance has doubled, from less than 600,000 to nearly 1,200,000—representing 40 per cent of the Negro student population.

In most cases, this has been peacefully achieved.

However, serious problems are being encountered both by communities and by courts—in part as a consequence of this accelerating pace.

The problems

In some communities, racially mixed schools have brought the community greater interracial harmony; in others they have heightened racial tension and exacerbated racial frictions. Integration is no longer seen automatically and necessarily as an unmixed blessing for the Negro, Puerto Rican or Mexican-American child. "Racial balance" has been discovered to be neither a static nor a finite condition; in many cases it has turned out to be only a way station on the road to resegregation. Whites have deserted the public schools, often for grossly inadequate private schools. They have left the now re-segregated public schools foundering for lack of support. And when whites flee the central city in pursuit of all- or predominantly-white schools in the suburbs, it is not only the central city schools that become racially isolated, but the central city itself.

These are not theoretical problems, but actual problems. They exist not just in the realm of law, but in the realm of human attitudes and human behavior. They are part of the real world, and we have to take account of them.

The complexities

Courts are confronted with problems of equity, and administrators with problems of policy. For example: To what extent does desegregation of dual systems require positive steps to achieve integration? How are the rights of individual children and their parents to be guarded in the process of enforcement? What are the educational impacts of the various means of desegregation—and where they appear to conflict, how should the claims of education be balanced against those of integration? To what extent should desegregation plans attempt to anticipate the problem of *re*segregation?

These questions suggest the complexity of the problems. These problems confront us in the North as well as the South, and in rural communities, suburbs and central cities.

The troubles in our schools have many sources. They stem in part from deeply rooted racial attitudes; in part from differences in social, economic and behavioral patterns; in part from weaknesses and inequities in the educational system itself; in part from the fact that by making schools the primary focus of efforts to remedy long-standing social ills, in some cases greater pressure has been brought to bear on the schools than they could withstand.

The context

Progress toward school desegregation is part of two larger processes, each equally essential:

—The improvement of educational opportunities for all of America's children.

—The lowering of artificial racial barriers in all aspects of American life.

Only if we keep each of these considerations clearly in mind—and only if we recognize their separate natures—can we approach the question of school desegregation realistically.

It may be helpful to step back for a moment, and to consider the problem of school desegregation in its larger context.

The school stands in a unique relationship to the community, to the family, and to the individual student. It is a focal point of community life. It has a powerful impact on the future of all who attend. It is a place not only of learning, but also of living—where a child's friendships center, where he learns to measure himself against others, to share, to compete, to cooperate—and it is the one institution above all others with which the parent shares his child.

Thus it is natural that whatever affects the schools stirs deep feelings among parents, and in the community at large.

Whatever threatens the schools, parents perceive—rightly—as a threat to their children.

Whatever makes the schools more distant from the family undermines one of the important supports of learning.

Quite understandably, the prospect of any abrupt change in the schools is seen as a threat.

As we look back over these sixteen years, we find that many changes that stirred fears when they first were ordered have turned out well. In many Southern communities, black and white children now learn together—and both the schools and the communities are better where the essential changes have been accomplished in a peaceful way.

But we also have seen situations in which the changes have not worked well. These have tended to command the headlines, thus increasing the anxieties of those still facing change.

Overburdening the schools

One of the mistakes of past policy has been to demand too much of our schools: They have been expected not only to educate, but also to accomplish a social transformation. Children in many instances have not been served, but used—in what all too often has proved a tragically futile effort to achieve in the schools the kind of a multi-racial society which the adult community has failed to achieve for itself.

If we are to be realists, we must recognize that in a free society there are limits to the amount of government coercion that can reasonably be used; that in achieving desegregation we must proceed with the least possible disruption of the education of the nation's children; and that our children are highly sensitive to conflict, and highly vulnerable to lasting psychic injury.

Failing to recognize these factors, past policies have placed on the schools and the children too great a share of the burden of eliminating racial disparities throughout our society. A major part of this task falls to the schools. But they cannot do it all or even most of it by themselves. Other institutions can share the burden of breaking down racial barriers, but only the schools can perform the task of education itself. If our schools fail to educate, then whatever they may achieve in integrating the races will turn out to be only a pyrrhic victory.

With housing patterns what they are in many places in the nation, the sheer numbers of pupils and the distances between schools make full and prompt school integration in every such community impractical—even if there were a sufficient desire on the part of the community to achieve it. In Los Angeles, 78 per cent of all Negro pupils attend schools that are 95 per cent or more black. In Chicago the figure is 85 per cent—the same as in Mobile, Alabama. Many smaller cities have the same patterns. Nationwide, 61 per cent of all Negro students attend schools which are 95 per cent or more black.

Demands that an arbitrary "racial balance" be established as a matter of right misinterpret the law and misstate the priorities.

As a matter of educational policy, some school boards have chosen to arrange their school systems in such a way as to provide a greater measure of racial integration. The important point to bear in mind is that where the existing racial separation has not been caused by official action, this increased integration is and should remain a matter for local determination.

Pupil assignments involve problems which do not arise in the case of the assignment of teachers. If school administrators were truly color blind and teacher assignments did not reflect the color of the teacher's skin, the law of averages would eventually dictate an approximate racial balance of teachers in each school within a system.

NOT JUST A MATTER OF RACE

Available data on the educational effects of integration are neither definitive nor comprehensive. But such data as we have suggest strongly that, under the appropriate conditions, racial integration in the classroom can be a significant factor in improving the quality of education for the disadvantaged. At the same time, the data lead us into several more of the complexities that surround the desegregation issue.

For one thing, they serve as a reminder that, from an educational standpoint, to approach school questions solely in terms of race is to go astray. The data tell us that in educational terms, the significant factor is not race but rather the educational environment in the home—and indeed, that the single most important educational factor in a school is the kind of home environment its pupils come from. As a general rule, children from families whose home environment encourages learning—whatever their race—are higher achievers; those from homes offering little encouragement are lower achievers.

Which effect the home environment has depends on such things as whether books and magazines are available, whether the family subscribes to a newspaper, the educational level of the parents, and their attitude toward the child's education.

The data strongly suggest, also, that in order for the positive benefits of integration to be achieved, the school must have a majority of children from environments that encourage learning—recognizing, again, that the key factor is not race but the kind of home the child comes from. The greater concentration of pupils whose homes encourage learning—of whatever race—the higher the achievement levels not only of those pupils, but also of others in the same school. Students learn from students. The reverse is also true: the greater concentration of pupils from homes that discourage learning, the lower the achievement levels of all.

We should bear very carefully in mind, therefore, the distinction between educational difficulty as a result of race, and educational difficulty as a result of social or economic levels, of family background, of cultural patterns, or simply of bad schools. Providing better education for the disadvantaged requires a more sophisticated approach than mere racial mathematics.

In this same connection, we should recognize that a smug paternalism has characterized the attitudes of many white Americans toward school questions. There has been an implicit assumption that blacks or others of minority races would be improved by association with whites. The notion that an all-black or predominantly-black school is automatically inferior to one which is all or predominantly-white—even though not a product of a dual system—inescapably carries racist overtones. And, of course, we know of hyprocrisy; not a few of those in the North most stridently demanding racial integration of public schools in the South at the same time send their children to private schools to avoid the assumed inferiority of mixed public schools.

It is unquestionably true that most black schools—though by no means all—are in fact inferior to most white schools. This is due in part to past neglect or shortchanging of the black schools; and in part to long-term patterns of racial discrimination which caused a greater proportion of Negroes to be left behind educationally, left out culturally, and trapped in low paying jobs. It is not really because they serve black children that most of these schools are inferior, but rather because they serve poor children who often lack the home environment that encourages learning.

Innovative approaches

Most public discussion of overcoming racial isolation centers on such concepts as compulsory "busing"—taking children out of the schools they would normally attend, and forcing them instead to attend others more distant, often in strange or even hostile neighborhoods. Massive "bussing" is seen by some as the only alternative to massive racial isolation.

However, a number of new educational ideas are being developed, designed to provide the educational benefits of integration without depriving the student of his own neighborhood school.

For example, rather than attempting dislocation of whole schools, a portion of a child's educational activities may be shared with children from other schools. Some of his education is in a "home-base" school, but some outside it. This "outside learning" is in settings that are defined neither as black nor white, and sometimes in settings that are not even in traditional school buildings. It may range all the way from intensive work in reading to training in technical skills, and to joint efforts such as drama and athletics.

By bringing the children together on "neutral" territory friction may be dispelled; by limiting it to part-time activities no one would be deprived of his own neighborhood school; and the activities themselves provide the children with better education.

This sort of innovative approach demonstrates that the alternatives are not limited to perpetuating racial isolation on the one hand, and massively disrupting existing school patterns on the other. Without uprooting students, devices of this kind can provide an additional educational experience within an integrated setting. The child gains both ways.

Good faith and the courts

Where desegregation proceeds under the mandate of law, the best results require that the plans be carefully adapted to local circumstances.

A sense of compassionate balance is indispensable. The concept of balance is no stranger to our Constitution. Even First Amendment freedoms are not absolute and unlimited; rather the scales of that "balance" have been adjusted with minute care, case by case, and the process continues.

In my discussion of the status of school desegregation law, I indicated that the Supreme Court has left a substantial degree of latitude within which specific desegregation plans can be designed. Many lower courts have left a comparable degree of latitude. This does not mean that the courts will tolerate or the Administration condone evasions or subterfuges; it does mean that if the essential element of good faith is present, it should ordinarily be possible to achieve legal compliance with a minimum of educational disruption, and through a plan designed to be responsive to the community's own local circumstances.

This matter of good faith is critical.

Thus the far-sighted local leaders who have demonstrated good faith by smoothing the path of compliance in their communities have helped lay the basis for judicial attitudes taking more fully into account the practical problems of compliance.

How the Supreme Court finally rules on the major issues it has not yet determined can have a crucial impact on the future of public education in the United States.

Traditionally, the Court has refrained from deciding Constitutional questions until it became necessary. This period of legal uncertainty has occasioned vigorous controversy over what the thrust of the law should be.

As a nation, we should create a climate in which these questions, when they finally are decided by the Court, can be decided in a framework most conducive to reasonable and realistic interpretation.

We should not provoke any court to push a Constitutional principle beyond its ultimate limit in order to compel compliance with the court's essential, but more modest, mandate. The best way to avoid this is for the nation to demonstrate that it does intend to carry out the full spirit of the Constitutional mandate.

POLICIES OF THIS ADMINISTRATION

It will be the purpose of this Administration to carry out the law fully and fairly. And where problems exist that are beyond the mandate of legal requirements, it will be our purpose to seek solutions that are both realistic and appropriate.

I have instructed the Attorney General, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, and other appropriate officials of the Government to be guided by these basic principles and policies:

Principles of enforcement

—Deliberate racial segregation of pupils by official action is unlawful, wherever it exists. In the words of the Supreme Court, it must be eliminated "root and branch"—and it must be eliminated at once.

—Segregation of teachers must be eliminated. To this end, each school system in this nation, North and South, East and West, must move immediately, as the Supreme Court has ruled, toward a goal under which "in each school the ratio of White to Negro faculty members is substantially the same as it is throughout the system."

—With respect to school facilities, school administrators throughout the nation, North and South, East and West, must move immediately, also in conformance with the Court's ruling, to assure that schools within individual school districts do not discriminate with respect to the quality of facilities or the quality of education delivered to the children within the district.

—In devising local compliance plans, primary weight should be given to the considered judgment of local school boards—provided they act in good faith, and within Constitutional limits.

—The neighborhood school will be deemed the most appropriate base for such a system.

—Transportation of pupils beyond normal geographic school zones for the purpose of achieving racial balance will not be required.

—Federal advice and assistance will be made available on request, but Federal officials should not go beyond the requirements of law in attempting to impose their own judgment on the local school district.

—School boards will be encouraged to be flexible and creative in formulating plans that are educationally sound and that result in effective desegregation.

—Racial imbalance in a school system may be partly de jure in origin, and partly de facto. In such a case, it is appropriate to insist on remedy for the de jure portion, which is unlawful, without insisting on a remedy for the lawful de facto portion.

—De facto racial separation, resulting genuinely from housing patterns, exist in the South as well as the North; in neither area should this condition by itself be cause for Federal enforcement actions. De jure segregation brought about by deliberate school-board gerrymandering exists in the North as the South; in both areas this must be remedied. In all respects, the law should be applied equally, North and South, East and West.

This is one nation. We are one people. I feel strongly that as Americans we must be done, now and for all future time, with the divisive notion that these problems are sectional.

Policies for progress

—In those communities facing desegregation orders, the leaders of the communities will be encouraged to lead—not in defiance, but in smoothing the way of compliance. One clear lesson of experience is that local leadership is a fundamental factor in determining success or failure. Where leadership has been present, where it has been mobilized, where it has been effective, many districts have found that they could, after all, desegregate their schools successfully. Where local leadership has failed, the community has failed—and the schools and the children have borne the brunt of that failure.

—We shall launch a concerted, sustained and honest effort to assemble and evaluate the lessons of experience: to determine what methods of school desegregation have worked, in what situations, and why—and also what has not worked. The Cabinet-level working group I recently appointed will have as one of its principal functions amassing just this sort of information and helping make it available to the communities in need of assistance.

—We shall attempt to develop a far greater body of reliable data than now exists on the effects of various integration patterns on the learning process. Our effort must always be to preserve the educational benefit for the children.

—We shall explore ways of sharing more broadly the burdens of social transition that have been laid disproportionately on the schools—ways, that is, of shifting to other public institutions a greater share of the task of undoing the effects of racial isolation.

—We shall seek to develop and test a varied set of approaches to the problems associated with "de facto" segregation, North as well as South.

—We shall intensify our efforts to ensure that the gifted child—the potential leader—is not stifled intellectually merely because he is black or brown or lives in a slum.

—While raising the quality of education in all schools, we shall concentrate especially on racially-impacted schools, and particularly on equalizing those schools that are furthest behind.

Words often ring empty without deeds. In government, words can ring even emptier without dollars.

In order to give substance to these commitments, I shall ask Congress to divert $500 million from my previous budget requests for other domestic programs for Fiscal 1971, to be put instead into programs for improving education in racially-impacted areas, North and South, and for assisting school districts in meeting special problems incident to court-ordered desegregation. For Fiscal 1972, I have ordered that $1 billion be budgeted for the same purposes.

I am not content simply to see this money spent, and then to count the spending as the measure of accomplishment. For much too long, national "commitments" have been measured by the number of Federal dollars spent rather than by more valid measures such as the quality of imagination displayed, the amount of private energy enlisted or, even more to the point, the results achieved.

If this $1.5 billion accomplishes nothing, then the commitment will mean nothing.

If it enables us to break significant new ground, then the commitment will mean everything.

This I deeply believe:

Communities desegregating their schools face special needs—for classrooms, facilities, teachers, teacher training—and the nation should help meet those needs.

The nation also has a vital and special stake in upgrading education where de facto segregation persists—and where extra efforts are needed if the schools are to do their job. These schools, too, need extra money for teachers and facilities.

Beyond this, we need to press forward with innovative new ways of overcoming the effects of racial isolation and of making up for environmental deficiencies among the poor.

I have asked the Vice President's Cabinet Committee on School Desegregation, together with the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, to consult with experts in and out of government and prepare a set of recommended criteria for the allocation of these funds.

I have specified that these criteria should give special weight to four categories of need:

—The special needs of desegregating (or recently desegregated) districts for additional facilities, personnel and training required to get the new, unitary system successfully started.

—The special needs of racially-impacted schools where de facto segregation persists—and where immediate infusions of money can make a real difference in terms of educational effectiveness.

—The special needs of those districts that have the furthest to go to catch up educationally with the rest of the nation.

—The financing of innovative techniques for providing educationally sound interracial experiences for children in racially isolated schools.

This money—the $500 million next year, and $1 billion in Fiscal 1972—must come from other programs. Inevitably, it represents a further reordering of priorities on the domestic scene. It represents a heightened priority for making school desegregation work, and for helping the victims of racial isolation learn.

Nothing is more vital to the future of our nation than the education of its children; and at the heart of equal opportunity is equal educational opportunity. These funds will be an investment in both the quality and the equality of that opportunity.

This money is meant to provide help now, where help is needed now.

As we look to the longer-term future, it is vital that we concentrate more effort on understanding the process of learning—and improving the process of teaching. The educational needs we face cannot be met simply with more books, more classrooms and more teachers—however urgently these are needed now in schools that face shortages. We need more effective methods of teaching, and especially of teaching those children who are hardest to reach and most lacking in a home environment that encourages learning.

In my message on education reform earlier this month, I proposed creation of a National Institute of Education to conduct and to sponsor basic and applied educational research—with special emphasis on compensatory education for the disadvantaged, on the Right to Read, on experimental schools and on the use of television for educational purposes.

I repeat that proposal—and I ask that the Congress consider it a matter of high priority.

A FREE AND OPEN SOCIETY

The goal of this Administration is a free and open society. In saying this, I use the words "free" and "open" quite precisely.

Freedom has two essential elements: the right to choose, and the ability to choose. The right to move out of a mid-city slum, for example, means little without the means of doing so. The right to apply for a good job means little without access to the skills that make it attainable. By the same token, those skills are of little use if arbitrary policies exclude the person who has them because of race or other distinction.

Similarly, an "open" society is one of open choices—and one in which the individual has the mobility to take advantage of those choices.

In speaking of "desegregation" or "integration," we often lose sight of what these mean within the context of a free, open, pluralistic society. We cannot be free, and at the same time be required to fit our lives into prescribed places on racial grid—whether segregated or integrated, and whether by some mathematical formula or by automatic assignment. Neither can we be free, and at the same time be denied—because of race—the right to associate with our fellow-citizens on a basis of human equality.

An open society does not have to be homogeneous, or even fully integrated. There is room within it for many communities. Especially in a nation like America, it is natural that people with a common heritage retain special ties; it is natural and right that we have Italian or Irish or Negro or Norwegian neighborhoods; it is natural and right that members of those communities feel a sense of group identity and group pride. In terms of an open society, what matters is mobility: the right and the ability of each person to decide for himself where and how he wants to live, whether as part of the ethnic enclave or as part of the larger society—or, as many do, share the life of both.

We are richer for our cultural diversity; mobility is what allows us to enjoy it.

Economic, educational, social mobility—all these, too, are essential elements of the open society. When we speak of equal opportunity we mean just that: that each person should have an equal chance at the starting line, and an equal chance to go just as high and as far as his talents and energies will take him.

This Administration's programs for helping the poor, for equal opportunity, for expanded opportunity, all have taken a significantly changed direction from those of previous years—and those principles of a free and open society are the keys to the new direction.

Instead of making a man's decisions for him, we aim to give him both the right and ability to choose for himself—and the mobility to move upward. Instead of creating a permanent welfare class catered to by a permanent welfare bureaucracy, for example, my welfare reform proposal provides job training and a job requirement for all those able to work—and also a regular Family Assistance payment instead of the demeaning welfare handout.

By pressing hard for the "Philadelphia Plan," we have sought to crack the color bar in the construction unions—and thus to give black and other minority Americans both the right and the ability to choose jobs in the construction trades, among the highest paid in the nation.

We have inaugurated new Minority Business Enterprise programs—not only to help minority members get started in business themselves, but also, by developing more black and brown entrepreneurs, to demonstrate to young blacks, Mexican-Americans and others that they, too, can aspire to this same sort of upward economic mobility.

In our education programs, we have stressed the need for far greater diversity in offerings to match the diversity of individual needs—including more and better vocational and technical training, and a greater development of 2-year community colleges.

Such approaches have been based essentially on faith in the individual—knowing that he sometimes needs help, but believing that in the long run he usually knows what is best for himself. Through them also runs a belief that education is the key that opens the door to personal progress.

As we strive to make our schools places of equal educational opportunity, we should keep our eye fixed on this goal: To achieve a set of conditions in which neither the laws nor the institutions supported by law any longer draw an invidious distinction based on race; and going one step further, we must seek to repair the human damage wrought by past segregation. We must give the minority child, that equal place at the starting line that his parents were denied—and the pride, the dignity, the self-respect, that are the birthright of a free American.

We can do no less and still be true to our conscience and our Constitution. I believe that most Americans today, whether North or South, accept this as their duty.

The issues involved in desegregating schools, reducing racial isolation and providing equal education opportunity are not simple. Many of the questions are profound, the factors complex, the legitimate considerations in conflict, and the answers elusive. Our continuing search, therefore, must be not for the perfect set of answers, but for the most nearly perfect and the most constructive.

I am aware that there are many sincere Americans who believe deeply in instant solutions and who will say that my approach does not go far enough fast enough. They feel that the only way to bring about social justice is to integrate all schools now, everywhere, no matter what the cost in the disruption of education.

I am aware, too, that there are many equally sincere citizens—North and South, black and white—who believe that racial separation is right, and wish the clock of progress would stop or be turned back to 1953. They will be disappointed, too.

But the call for equal educational opportunity today is in the American tradition. From the outset of the nation, one of the great struggles in America has been to transform the system of education into one that truly provided equal opportunity for all. At first, the focus was on economic discrimination. The system of "fee schools" and "pauper schools" persisted well into the 19th century.

Heated debates preceded the establishment of universal free public education—and even in such States as New York, New Jersey and Connecticut, the system is barely a century old.

Even today, inequities persist. Children in poor areas often are served by poor schools—and unlike the children of the wealthy, they cannot escape to private schools. But we have been narrowing the gap—providing more and better education in more of the public schools, and making higher education more widely available through free tuition, scholarships and loans.

In other areas, too, there were long struggles to eliminate discrimination that had nothing to do with race. Property and even religious qualifications for voting persisted well into the 19th century—and not until 1920 were women finally guaranteed the right to vote.

Now the focus is on race—and on the dismantling of all racial bars to equality of opportunity in the schools. As with the lowering of economic barriers, the pull of conscience and the pull of national self-interest both are in the same direction. A system that leaves any segment of its people poorly educated serves the nation badly; a system that educates all of its people well serves the nation well.

We have overcome many problems in our 190 years as a nation. We can overcome this problem. We have managed to extend opportunity in other areas. We can extend it in this area. Just as other rights have been secured, so too can these rights be secured—and once again the nation will be better for having done so.

I am confident that we can preserve and improve our schools, carry out the mandate of our Constitution, and be true to our national conscience.

POSTAL REFORM AND SALARY ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1970

(Mr. BLACKBURN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD, and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, within the next few weeks this body will be considering H.R. 4, the Postal Reform and Salary Adjustment Act of 1970. Under the terms of this legislation, all labor management activities of the postal authority to be established by this will be conducted under the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act of 1948—Taft-Hartley.

As all members of this body are aware, this act allows for the negotiation of union shop agreements in private industries except where State law specifically prohibits such contracts. If this act is applied to the new postal authority, it would enable postal unions to negotiate union shop agreements for the whole postal service.

Some will argue that State laws should apply to this matter. However, the Supreme Court in United States v. Sharpnack, 355 U.S. 286 (1958), ruled that State laws do not generally apply on Federal reservations, State laws only apply on Federal reservations where such laws are of a criminal nature. Generally, State right-to-work laws are civil in nature and therefore would not apply to prevent a closed or union shop on property owned by the Post Office.

Recently Joseph Young, the Federal affairs reporter for the Washington Evening Star in a brief column succinctly discussed this problem. For the information of my colleagues I hereby insert this column into the RECORD:

[From the Evening Star, Mar. 15, 1970]

POSTAL BILL COULD OPEN WAY FOR COMPULSORY UNIONISM

(By Joseph Young)

Compulsory unionism could occur in the government within the next few years.

The postal reform bill approved by the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee provides that the union shop is an issue of negotiation between the postal employee unions and postal management under the proposed collective bargaining system.

Should an impasse develop on the union shop, it would go to third-party binding arbitration. Thus, if the arbitrator ruled for the unions, there would be a union shop in the postal service, with employes required to belong to one of the unions representing their craft in order to hold their jobs.

The only exception to this would be in 19 states which have right-to-work laws which bar the union shop.

Should postal employe unions get the union shop, federal employe unions would certainly seek the same rights.

Nearly 90 percent of all postal workers are unionized so a union shop would apply nationwide, except in 19 right-to-work States.

The majority of federal classified and blue collar workers are not unionized, although the rate of unionization among them has grown tremendously in the past decade.

What federal employe union leaders would ask for is a union shop in all of the government installations and offices in which they have exclusive recognition by virtue of having won majority elections.

The National Right-to-Work Committee strongly opposes any union shop in government and is lining up support for an amendment that will be offered by conservative forces in the House when the postal reform bill is voted on to forbid any union shop in government.

The committee also declares that there is doubt that postal workers in the 19 Right-to-Work States would be protected against the union shop.

THE U.S. ARMS CONTROL AND DISARMAMENT AGENCY

(Mr. ADAIR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks, and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, the House Committee on Foreign Affairs has recently held hearings on the authorization bill for the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency which, under the leadership of ACDA Director, Gerald C. Smith, is doing a very effective job.

Recently ACDA issued a report and news release on "World Military Expenditures in 1969." Because of the broad interest within the Congress on this subject, I am pleased to submit excerpts from the news release:

World military spending reached a record $200 billion in 1969, up 44 percent since 1964, but preliminary data now available suggest that the year-to-year increase slowed down during the past two years and that some reduction in the ratio to world income is likely if the pattern continues.

The new statistics were issued today by the United States Arms Control and Disarmament Agency in its fourth annual report on global outlays based on national data for 120 countries. The study for the first time covers estimated spending through the calendar year just ended.

ACDA Director Gerald C. Smith, who is also the Chief U.S. Negotiator in the strategic arms limitation talks with the Soviet Union, states in his introduction: "The report shows the rise in military spending continuing, although it is less sharp. The world remains the poorer for it."

Between 1965 and 1967, world military expenditures in current prices soared at the rate of 13 percent a year. Since 1967, the increase has averaged five percent yearly. Most of the increase in this latter period has resulted from price inflation. In terms of constant prices, 1969 expenditures were three percent above 1967 and only fractionally higher than in 1968.

Despite the more encouraging recent trend, ACDA points out that it will take more than a diminished rate of increase to lessen significantly the heavy economic burden of military spending. The Agency reports that if recent spending patterns were to continue, the nations of the world by the end of the 1970's will be devoting more than $300 billion a year to defense. Over the decade, they would have spent for this one purpose alone an amount virtually, equivalent to the present tangible wealth of the United States—all the land, homes, factories, highways, minerals, and other real assets.

Furthermore, the global slowdown in the rate of increase has been accompanied by an acceleration in the countries that can least afford it.

Highlights of the report show that of the $200 billion spent for defense in 1969, $174 billion was spent by the developed countries and $26 billion by developing countries. Expressed in constant dollars, expenditures of developed countries were unchanged from 1967—the latest year covered by the previous study—to 1969, but the spending by developing countries rose 25 percent.

The world's total military outlays in current dollars grew from $139 billion in 1964, $143 billion in 1965, $160 billion in 1966, $181 billion in 1967, to an estimated $191 billion in 1968.

Including the $200 billion for 1969, this means that over the six-year period more than $1 trillion ($1,000,000,000,000) have been spent on arms and Armed Forces. Measured against available economic resources, the sum exceeds the value of all goods and services produced in the United States in the past year; it is more than two years' income for the world's developing countries in which two and one-half billion people live; and it is equal to as much public money as was spent by all governments on all forms of public education and health care in the six-year period.

. . . an increasing portion of world outlays was found in the military expenditures of countries outside the two major blocs. In both 1968 and 1969, the military budgets of such countries appeared to be growing at a rate more than twice that of the world total, reflecting an accelerated arms race in some of the developing countries.

The ACDA report finds that the upward spiral of arms budgets in poorer countries was "one of the most striking—and disturbing—aspects of the latest trends in world military spending."

The study contains a series of charts covering world military expenditures from 1964 to 1969 and comparisons with GNP for the same period, developed and developing countries' shares of the world total in 1967, the realative burden of military expenditures by country, world military and other public expenditures, and average per capita expenditures for military, education, and health by region.

A unique feature of the ACDA report is that it provides comparative figures in dollars for each of the 120 countries in the survey. The statistical tables show national expenditures for defense, education, health and foreign aid, as well as GNP, population and armed forces. The latest year for which the detailed data are available for all the countries is 1967. ACDA has estimated world trends in military spending and GNP for 1968 and 1969 based on preliminary and partial national figures. Several international and U.S. agencies contribute statistics to the report.

The study was made by the Arms Control Agency's Economics Bureau, headed by Robert H. B. Wade, an assistant director of the Agency and former U.S. Permant Representative to the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). It represents part of the Bureau's effort to meet its responsibilities for a continuing study of the effects of military spending on both the international and the domestic scene.

EXTENSION OF PAY RAISE TO POSTMASTERS AND SUPERVISORS

(Mr. SCOTT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I received a telegram last night from the president of the National Association of Postmasters requesting that Congress apply any pay raise given postal employees in an equitable manner so that postmasters and supervisors who attempted to handle the mail during the recent strike not be discriminated against in favor of those who did illegally strike.

It may be that the telegram was only sent to members of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, and I insert it in the RECORD at this point in full for the information of the entire membership.

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
March 25, 1970.

Hon. WILLIAM L. SCOTT,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.:

We earnestly plead that in considering pay raises for postal employees that Congress in its wisdom apply such raises equitably to all postmasters and supervisory levels. You will not find postmasters and supervisors striking to get a pay raise. They were there trying to handle the mail when the rank and file employees were out on strike.

BREMER EHRLER,
President, National Association of Postmasters.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE ON HIGHER EDUCATION

(Mr. MAYNE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the President has sent to the Congress a message dealing with higher education. I commend it to all of my colleagues.

I would like especially to call attention to the President's recommendations for increasing the funds available for loans to college students. The administration has proposed the creation of a National Student Loan Association which would enable students of all income levels to obtain Government-guaranteed loans. It is estimated that during the first year of operation alone this device would increase the pool of lendable funds by over $1 billion.

In addition, every eligible student would be able to borrow up to $2,500 a year and to repay the loan over a 20-year period. I am certain that this message will be good news to the many parents who have young children and who are wondering how they will be able to pay for the college costs of these children. I urge careful attention to the Higher Education Opportunity Act.

AMBASSADOR PHILIP C. HABIB, ACTING HEAD, AMERICAN DELEGATION TO PARIS MEETINGS ON VIETNAM

(Mr. MORTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks, and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Speaker, recently some individuals have been saying that our negotiating position is being hurt by not having a qualified permanent head of the American delegation to the Paris meeting on Vietnam. I disagree with those who are taking this position and fear that our negotiating position may have been hurt by such statements.

Ambassador Philip C. Habib is extremely capable and more than qualified to represent the American interests in Paris. His familiarity and direct experience with the situation in Vietnam is extensive. Ambassador Habib's career exemplifies the finest in government service. He has received recognition of high order for his outstanding service.

For the RECORD I am including a brief résumé of Ambassador Habib's career which is very impressive.

AMBASSADOR PHILIP C. HABIB ACTING HEAD, AMERICAN DELEGATION TO PARIS MEETINGS ON VIETNAM

Ambassador Habib was born in New York City on February 25, 1920. He is married and has two daughters. He received his B.S. at the University of Idaho in 1942 and a Ph.D. (Economics) at the University of California (Berkeley) in 1952. During World War II he served as a Captain overseas in the United States Army. Ambassador Habib is a career Foreign Service Officer Class 1. He has been with the U.S. Delegation at the Paris talks since the first meetings were held in May, 1968. He was made Acting Head of the Delegation and given the personal rank of Ambassador by President Nixon on December 15, 1969.

Ambassador Habib joined the Department of State in 1949. Since then, he served in the Department and at Foreign Service posts abroad at Ottawa, Wellington, Port of Spain, Seoul, Saigon and, currently, in Paris. He served in the Department of State as Deputy Assistant Secretary in the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs, with special responsibility for Viet-nam, from July 1967 to May 1968.

In addition to other foreign policy responsibilities he has had, Ambassador Habib served as Minister-Counsellor for Political Affairs at our Embassy in Saigon under Ambassadors Henry Cabot Lodge and Ellsworth Bunker, from 1965 to 1967, and as Counselor of Embassy for Political Affairs in Seoul, Korea, from 1962 to 1965.

Ambassador Habib has been President of the American Foreign Service Association. In 1969, he received the Rockefeller Public Service Award in the field of foreign affairs.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PUCINSKI. I would like to congratulate the gentleman for his remarks today. I think they are of great importance. I think it is extremely important that the distinguished gentleman should make the statement that he has made because he is one of the most significant political leaders in America. I hope the negotiators for North Vietnam will recognize the fact that Mr. Habib has the full and unquestioned confidence of all of us here in Congress. He has attended every single session from the very first session. I do not know anyone in this world who is better qualified and more knowledgeable on all the aspects of these negotiations than Ambassador Habib. I congratulate the gentleman for his statement.

Mr. MORTON. I thank the gentleman from Illinois for his fine contribution.

POSTAL NEGOTIATIONS

(Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I merely wanted to take this opportunity to make an observation in connection with the colloquy that took place earlier today between the distinguished majority leader (Mr. ALBERT) and the chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee (Mr. DULSKI). The statement was made that the leadership here in the House had not been informed as to the precise progress, if any, occuring in the talks now going on between the representatives of the Post Office Department and the representatives of the so-called exclusive unions or postal unions.

It is my understanding that there is an agreement—and it was one that was arrived at between the representatives of the postal unions and the management representatives at the table—that they would deliberately try to negotiate these matters without making any statements or public releases of information to anyone until they felt that the negotiations had progressed to the point where that could be done without jeopardizing the success of the outcome of the negotiations.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, the occasion of my remarks simply was that someone asked the chairman whether he thought the Senate conferees were being advised, and he said yes. Then the chairman was asked, Were the House conferees being kept advised? And he said no. So far as I know, that is the situation.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it is certainly my understanding, and I want to assure the distinguished majority leader that I am convinced there is no intention on the part of the administration to affront the leadership on either side of this House, but in order to preserve the very delicate balance that does exist while the negotiations are going on, they want to maintain some degree of secrecy about what is being said on both sides.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE EUGENE J. MORIARTY

(Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the word I have just received on the passing of a beloved and respected friend, Eugene J. Moriarty, has deeply saddened me. Eugene Moriarty was my close personal friend, and served as executive editor of the Boston Herald-Traveler for over 30 years. He died last night at Boston Carney Hospital at the age of 62.

Born in Boston, he was a graduate of St. Margaret's School and High School of Commerce and attended Brown University. He was an honorary alumnus of Columbia University of New York.

Beginning his newspaper career at the Boston American, he rose to reporter. With this experience he went to New York and worked at the Bronx Home News and the New York Journal. He briefly returned to the Boston American and later went to Rhode Island to work for the Pawtucket Times as assistant managing editor.

Returning to his native Boston, he spent a year at the Herald and left to accept a position as managing editor of the Providence Tribune.

During the next few years he returned to Boston several times finally serving the Herald-Traveler as managing editor. As assistant managing editor of the Boston Herald, Moriarty directed coverage of such historic moments as the sinking of the Andrea Doria, the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, and the great blackout of 1965.

His career was climaxed when Moriarty was named executive editor of the Herald and Traveler 3 years prior to their merger.

Until incapacitated by his recent illness, Gene Moriarty worked with Cardinal Richard J. Cushing on the cardinal's $50 million jubilee fund drive. At that time, the cardinal said:

May God bless and reward you for your goodness. I promise you and your loved ones a faithful remembrance in my prayers.

Two years ago, he was honored by being elected corporator of the Lincoln Savings Bank in Boston.

His interest included a long-time membership in the St. Francis de Sales Society and was a founding member of the American Press Institute at Columbia University.

Harold E. Clancy, publisher of the Boston Herald-Traveler, said of Moriarty:

Gene Moriarty was a professional news man whose ability and integrity set daily standards over a more than 30 year career with the Herald-Traveler. He will be missed by this newspaper, its employees, and all of his associates.

The Boston local of the American Newspaper Guild which represents the editorial employees of the Herald-Traveler said of Moriarty:

Gene Moriarty was a fine man, a fair man, a man's man, a gentle man. He was truly a credit to our profession, a model for all who seek to achieve success in a field of journalism and in the far more important fields of gentility, kindness and fairness. He was a former member of the Guild but even when he left the Union to assume executive position he remained sympathetic to our goals and objectives. He was a friend. He will be sadly missed.

Not long before Gene Moriarty was taken ill, a longtime rival, the publisher of another Boston newspaper, stuck out his hand and said with respect: "The newspaper man's newspaper man."

Gene Moriarty was a man who was admired and respected for his ability, and at the same time, he could affectionately be sought out for his friendship and for the goodness of his heart.

Gene Moriarty leaves his wife, Mrs. Katherine Toomey Moriarty, at their home on 33 Oak Road, Milton, and daughter, Kathleen, an Emmanuel College graduate and teacher in a Dorchester, Mass., elementary school.

My deepest sympathy and prayer is extended to his devoted wife and daughter.

Mr. Speaker, I include two news articles, one by the Boston Herald-Traveler and the other by the Boston Globe.

E. J. MORIARTY DIES, HT EXECUTIVE EDITOR

Eugene J. Moriarty, executive editor of the Boston Herald Traveler, died last night in Carney Hospital. He was 62.

"Gene," as he was affectionately known by staff members and associates, was a veteran of half a dozen editorial staffs in Boston, Rhode Island and New York and had been more than 30 years with the Herald Traveler.

Born in Boston, he was a graduate of St. Margaret's School and the High School of Commerce and attended Brown University. He was an honorary alumnus of Columbia University in New York.

He began his newspaper career as an office boy at the Boston American and there rose to reporter.

With this background he headed for New York where he worked for the now-defunct Bronx Home News and for the New York Journal.

He then returned to the American and later joined the Pawtucket, R.I., Times as assistant managing editor.

Returning to Boston, he spent a year at the Herald and left to become managing editor of the Providence Tribune.

After returning to the American, where he served as city editor, he moved to the Traveler in the same capacity and eventually became its managing editor.

Prior to the merger of the Herald and the Traveler three years ago, Moriarty was named executive editor of both news staffs.

He also had been news editor and assistant managing editor of the Herald before the merger.

Herald Traveler Publisher Harold E. Clancy observed last night:

"Gene Moriarty was a professional newsman whose ability and integrity set daily standards over a more than 30-year career with the Herald Traveler. He will be missed by this newspaper, its employes and all of his associates."

The Boston local of the American Newspaper Guild, which represents editorial employes at the HT, said of the editor:

"Gene Moriarty was a fine man, a fair man, a man's man, a gentlemen. He was truly a credit to our profession, a model for all who seek to achieve success in the field of journalism and in the far more important fields of gentility, kindness and fairness.

"He was a former member of the Guild, but even when he left the union to assume executive positions, he remained sympathetic to our goals and objectives. He was a friend. He will be sadly missed."

The antithesis of moviedom's hard-bitten newsman, Moriarty won the unswering loyalty of his staff with his fairness, kindness and modesty.

But he could still growl and frown in high fashion when an erring reporter failed to produce as expected.

"I learned the trade under Gene," said one HT reporter last night, "and I learned it well. There was only one acceptable way to perform under him. That was to do the job right and do it fast. There was no other way."

"He was stinting with his praise," recalled another. "A smile from him was the equal of the Army's Medal of Honor.

"But if you were in trouble—and you were right—he'd fight like a tiger to protect you. He was my guy all the way."

Gene's skill at evaluating news, his sure, calm instructions when a big news story was breaking, drew the admiration of all who worked under him.

Until his illness, Moriarty served as an adviser for Cardinal Cushing's $50 million Jubilee Fund Drive, for which the cardinal wrote him:

"May God bless and reward you for your goodness. I promise you and your loved ones a faithful remembrance in prayers."

Heading the public relations program for the cardinal's fund drive was retired Herald editor Arthur E. Fetridge who also died yesterday.

Two years ago, Moriarty was elected a corporator of the Lincoln Savings Bank in Boston.

In addition to his news career, he was a long-time member of the St. Francis de Sales Society, a Greater Boston association of editorial workers, and was a member of the founding seminar of the American Press Institute at Columbia University.

He leaves his wife, Mrs. Katherine Toomey Moriarty, at their home at 33 Oak Rd., Milton, and a daughter, Kathleen, an Emmanuel College graduate and a teacher in a Dorchester elementray school.

EVEN RIVALS ADMIRED MORIARTY: NEWSPAPERMAN'S NEWSPAPERMAN

At a social gathering not long before Gene Moriarty was taken ill, the publisher of a rival newspaper stuck out his hand and said with respect:

"The newspaperman's newspaperman."

Since Gene Moriarty was a modest man—a truly modest man—the remark puzzled him, but it puzzled none of his friends.

For despite his modesty, Moriarty was in a business where each day his work was laid before the public, and over a period of 40 years that work had set standards for others in the business.

As City Editor of The Boston Traveler, Moriarty recruited what was probably the best afternoon newspaper staff in the East, if not in the country.

With zest and dash, they covered Massachusetts politics, daring the wrath of the Legislature and on occasion being barred from the floor of one or another house of the Legislature for a particularly incisive story.

As assistant managing editor of The Boston Herald, Moriarty directed coverage of such epic stories as the sinking of the Andrea Doria, the assassination of President John F. Kennedy and the Great Blackout of 1965.

When the papers merged in 1967, it was no surprise to the staff that Moriarty should be named to direct the new operation, and he set even higher standards.

When Robert F. Kennedy was shot by an assassin in June of 1968, Moriarty turned a morning newspaper into an around-the-clock operation, running as many as four extra editions.

His career began in the age of train and telegraph and ended with the footprints of men on the moon, but Moriarty seldom looked back.

He was more concerned with exploiting the potential of Telex machines and four-color processes than he was with nostalgia.

But on those rare occasions when he could be persuaded to recall the old days—usually in the early morning hours while awaiting a replate edition from the press room—the warmth of his personality glowed.

He especially enjoyed recalling the "O'Hara days." Westbrook Pegler referred to them as the "War of the Wild Irish Roses."

The war involved Walter O'Hara, proprietor of Narragansett Park and publisher of the Providence Star-Tribune, and Gov. Robert Quinn of Rhode Island.

Eugene J. Moriarty was the editor of the Star-Tribune and before it was over there were suits and counter-suits and the calling out of the National Guard, and Moriarty back home in Boston.

It was a measure of his spirit that there he was served with the papers of a suit alleging he had libeled a man by publishing a story about a bookmaking parlor in Gov. Quinn's hometown of Warwick.

The libelee sought damages of $25,000, and whatever became of the suit nobody knows.

But everybody who knew Gene will cherish his light-hearted remark when served with the papers in the $25,000 affair.

"Fine," he said, "this should help my credit."

EUGENE J. MORIARTY, AT 62; HERALD-TRAVELER EXECUTIVE EDITOR

Eugene J. Moriarty, 62, executive editor of the Boston Herald-Traveler, died last night in Carney Hospital.

"Gene," who began his newspaper career as an office boy at the Boston American, had served more than 30 years with the Herald Traveler.

He was well liked in the professional world. Last night Herald-Traveler Publisher Harold E. Clancy said:

"Gene Moriarty was a newsman whose ability and integrity set daily standards."

The Boston local of the American Newspaper Guild, which represents editorial employees at the Herald-Traveler, said of him:

"Gene Moriarty was a fine man, a fair man, a man's man, a gentle man. He was truly a credit to our profession, a model for all who ask to achieve success in the field of journalism and in the far more important fields of gentility, kindness and fairness."

He was a graduate of St. Margaret's School, Dorchester, and the High School of Commerce and was an alumnus of Brown University.

In early days he worked for the now-defunct Bronx Home News and the New York Journal. After a short stint at the Boston American he joined the Pawtucket, R.I. Times as a managing editor.

After a year at the Herald in Boston he went back to Rhode Island, as managing editor of the Providence Tribune. Returning to Boston, he served as city editor at the American, then moved to the Traveler in the same position. He was named executive editor upon consolidation of the Herald and Traveler.

He leaves his wife, Mrs. Katherine (Toomey) Moriarty, and a daughter, Kathleen, a teacher in a Dorchester elementary school. The family home is at 33 Oak rd., Milton.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts. I yield to the distinguished Speaker of the House.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am very sorry to learn of the death of Eugene Moriarty, and join with my distinguished friend and colleague (Mr. BURKE) in the expressions he has made and in extending to Mrs. Moriarty and to her daughter my deep and profound sympathy.

Eugene Moriarty was one of the outstanding members of his profession. He loved his profession. He lived up to the high ideals of the profession of journalism.

He always recognized that freedom of the press meant responsibility of the press and not license of the press, not abuse of the press.

He was one of those men who typified to the highest degree humanly possible the great traditions of a noble profession and a system guaranteeing freedom under our Constitution which is of invaluable aid and assistance to democratic institutions of government and to our people.

He was also very active in public affairs and private affairs such as charitable affairs.

Eugene Moriarty was a man of deep faith, a man of broad understanding, a man who not only impressed but also inspired others whom he met and who knew him to elevate their minds to the higher things, to the nobler things of life.

Eugene Moriarty played a very important part in many respects during his journey of life along the pathway of constructiveness. He will be greatly missed.

Again I extend to Mrs. Moriarty and her daughter my deepest sympathy in their bereavement.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts. I yield to my colleague from Massachusets.

Mr. BOLAND. I join my distinguished colleagues from Massachusetts, Speaker McCORMACK and Mr. BURKE, in paying tribute to Eugene Moriarty. A one-time copyboy who rose to the peak of his profession, Gene Moriarty was celebrated in the newspaper world for his tough professionalism and his coolheaded poise under the pressure of a deadline. He was, as the publisher of a rival Boston newspaper once described him, the "newspaperman's newspaperman."

Brisk and businesslike while crouched over his desk reading copy, Gene was still capable of the most remarkable kind of friendship and charity. A host of friends—friends ranging from Governors to copyboys—can testify to this fact. "If you were in trouble, and you were right, Gene would fight like a tiger to protect you," said one Herald-Traveler reporter of Gene's dogged tenacity in supporting the causes he felt just. As just one example, Gene spent countless hours as an adviser to Cardinal Cushing's $50 million Jubilee Fund Drive.

Beginning his newspaper career at the Boston American, he later moved to New York as a reporter for the old Bronx Home News and the New York Journal. He then returned to Boston, working a year at the Herald before heading for nearby Providence, R.I., to take on the managing editor's job of that city's Tribune. Before the merger of the Herald and the Traveler, Gene had become executive editor of both news staffs.

Gene, of course, was consumately skilled as a reporter and editor.

And, even more significantly, he was equally skilled in building lasting friendships with his colleagues throughout the Northeast.

I extend my deepest sympathy to his wife, Katherine, and his daughter, Kathleen.

With permission, Mr. Speaker, I put in the RECORD at this point an article on Gene published today by the Herald-Traveler:

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts. I yield to my colleague from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONTE. I want to join my colleague from Massachusetts, the Speaker of the House, and my colleague from the Second District, in mourning the death of the executive editor of the Boston Herald Traveler, Eugene J. Moriarty.

I cannot adequately pay tribute to a long and distinguished journalistic career in just a few brief words. That takes a talent found only in journalists of the caliber of Mr. Moriarty. But I am honored to have the opportunity to join with my colleagues in praising the fine works of this man.

It may be that Eugene Moriarty has written his last "30," but his career and his writing will long be remembered by his many friends throughout Massachusetts and throughout the country.

He was an outstanding newspaperman in the truest sense of the word. He was an excellent reporter, an outstanding editor, a man who reported the news as he saw it, and who always showed great responsibility.

I join my colleagues in extending my deepest sympathy to Mrs. Moriarty and her daughter.

You know, I think one of the greatest things you can say about a man is that he is a good man, and in my book Eugene Moriarty was a good man.

Mr. MACDONALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, my colleague in Congress, the honorable JAMES A. BURKE, spoke on the floor of the House this morning about Eugene J. Moriarty, whose untimely passing last night has deprived New England of a great spokesman.

I would like to join with Mr. BURKE in expressing my profound sorrow.

The great contribution Gene Moriarty has made to the newspaper business stands forever on the records of the Boston Herald-Traveler, where he so ably served for over 30 years.

I extend my deepest sympathy to his wife and daughter. I hope they will find some consolation in the knowledge that their loss is shared by countless others.

Mr. O'NEILL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my good friend and colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BURKE), in paying final tribute to Eugene J. Moriarty, executive manager of the Boston Herald-Traveler, who passed away suddenly last night at the Boston Carney Hospital at the age of 62.

Many meaningful thoughts have been expressed here today regarding the astonishing career of this fine newsman and more importantly, the integrity and gentility of the man himself. I share these sentiments, and I am profoundly saddened to learn of his untimely passing.

All my sympathy goes to those he has left behind, his beloved wife, Katherine, and his daughter, Kathleen.

Mr. KEITH. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in eulogizing Gene Moriarty. Although he was not a close personal friend, I knew him by reputation to have those fine qualities which my colleagues have just cited.

Through his own personal initiative and high standards of journalism, he worked his way up in the newspaper world and contributed the last 30 years of his life to the Boston Herald-Traveler and the community which it serves. The high standards which he set helped shape the character of this great newspaper. His character was reflected in the news and editorial columns of the Herald-Traveler. Like Homer Bigart of the New York Times, his scoops were straight and not slanted by personality; they contained facts which the reader could be sure would stand up in the second edition.

Mr. Speaker, Eugene Moriarty was a top-rate journalist and a great asset to the Boston area. Mrs. Keith joins me in extending our sincere condolences to his wife, Katherine, and his daughter, Kathleen.

Mrs. HECKLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I would like to associate myself with your remarks regretting the passing of Eugene J. Moriarty, executive editor of the Boston Herald-Traveler. I knew Gene Moriarty. I respected him highly, and I believe that his death is a great loss to New England and the profession in which he served so notably for 40 years.

I think there was a rather eloquent summation of what Gene Moriarty meant to his associates in his obituary in today's Herald-Traveler. An unidentified reporter expressed his feelings with these words:

> He was stinting with his praise. A smile from him was the equal of the Army's Medal of Honor. But if you were in trouble—and you were right—he'd fight like a tiger to protect you. He was my guy all the way.

I think Gene would have liked those words. He was demanding, as an editor should be. He was also known for his fairness and his modest nature. He was truly a unique human being.

Except for a brief period in New York, Gene Moriarty was a New England newspaperman. He started as an office boy as the Boston Record American. He served in editing positions with Rhode Island papers, but spent 30 years with the Herald-Traveler. He rose from city editor of the Traveler, before the Herald and Traveler were merged, to become executive editor of both news staffs. He contributed to the greatness of the newspaper.

He was a member of the Newspaper Guild in his earlier days, and was as much admired by the union as by those in executive positions. The Herald-Traveler said his career began in the age of train and telegraph and ended with the footprints of men on the moon, "but Moriarty seldom looked back." The challenge for him was today's deadline and tomorrow's news.

I extend my deepest sympathy to his wife, Katherine; his daughter, Kathleen; and to his associates who will deeply feel his loss. I join you, Mr. Speaker, in grieving at the passing of Gene Moriarty.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on this subject in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

DESEGREGATION STATEMENT

(Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday President Nixon issued a comprehensive statement on school desegregation in which he stated unequivocally that, "the constitutional mandate will be enforced." In the absence of a Supreme Court ruling on the constitutionality of de facto school segregation, the President has determined that it, "is undesirable but is not generally held to violate the Constitution." At the same time, the President recognized that—

> We are dealing fundamentally with inalienable human rights, some of them constitutionally protected. The final arbiter of Constitutional questions is the United States Supreme Court.

Until such time that the de facto segregation question has been settled by the Court, there will continue to be a legal distinction between de facto and de jure segregation. De facto segregation resulting from residential housing patterns, has not been held unconstitutional; de jure segregation, resulting from deliberate and legally sanctioned separation, is in clear violation of the Constitution. In President Nixon's words:

> There is a Constitutional mandate that dual school systems and other forms of de jure segregation be eliminated totally, and the law should be applied equally, North and South, East and West.

The President has further recognized the value of the neighborhood school and its "unique relationship to the community, to the family, and to the individual student." He has rejected the concept of massive busing of pupils at great distances, simply to achieve racial balance in the schools. He has asked that, to the extent possible, the neighborhood school system be preserved and maintained.

Given the reality of de facto segregation in the schools resulting from residential housing patterns, the President has addressed himself to the problems surrounding this unfortunate situation. He has spoken to the need to upgrade schools in the central city where pupils have suffered due to poor home environments and inadequate school facilities. He has called on the Congress to divert an additional $1.5 billion for the purpose of compensatory educational programs in racially impacted areas, and for programs to assist those districts which are in the process of desegregating their schools. There is an urgent need for this kind of attention if we are truly dedicated to the proposition of equal educational opportunities for all our schoolchildren.

Finally, the President has spoken forthrightly about the need for other institutions in our society to share the burden of breaking down racial barriers which exist. The administration has already begun its efforts to expand job opportunities for minority groups, and I think the Philadelphia plan in the construction industry is an excellent example of this commitment. The open housing law of 1968 will also be a key factor in allowing for the type of upward mobility the President said is so essential in a free and open society. In the President's words:

Freedom has two essential elements: the right to choose, and the ability to choose. The right to move out of a mid-city slum, for example, means little without the means of doing so.

So decent jobs are a prerequisite for obtaining decent housing. Likewise, a good education is esssential to obtaining a decent job. We must continue to press forward on all these fronts if all our citizens are to have the mobility which is fundamental to a free and open society.

Mr. Speaker, as this administration continues to demonstrate its commitment to these goals, I will lend my full and enthusiastic support.

RURAL AMERICA NEEDS HELP NOW

(Mr. RANDALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, because of the current high interest rates and near impossibility to borrow money, a severe blow has been dealt rural areas to secure financing for the installation of water systems and sewage disposal facilities.

Formerly, the Farmers Home Administration made grants and loans to small communities for construction of such public works for 5-percent interest. For the FHA to replenish its reservoir of funds, the practice has been to guarantee these loans and sell such guaranteed paper to private investors at 6 percent. Under sections of the Internal Revenue Code, such bonds have been regarded as municipal bonds; income in the form of interest was tax-free.

Recently the Treasury Department and Bureau of the Budget ruled it is not in the public interest for the Government to insure loans to public bodies if the income from these loans is tax-free when transferred in the form of bonds to private investors.

Although the Treasury Department-Budget Bureau ruling seems to be consistent with treatment accorded the sale of other Government-insured securities, such ruling has virtually halted the construction of water-sewage systems in unincorporated areas of rural America, because rural areas sometimes have no corporate structure to back the bonds they might issue themselves. There is no established credit rating to recommend such securities to private investors.

Enabling legislation is necessary to provide for a tax on the interest income from such bonds if they are still to be guaranteed by the FHA.

I am today introducing a bill which will in effect permit purchasers of water-sewer bonds guaranteed by the FHA to be subject to a tax derived from these bonds. If my bill or similar legislation is passed these bonds would become available for purcase by private investors. I hope the appropriate committee will move with dispatch to implement this or similar legislation.

TOM EAGLETON PINPOINTS THE ISSUES

(Mr. RANDALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, the junior Senator from the State of Missouri made, in my opinion, a most excellent presentation of the issues that will be presented for the consideration of the American people in the November 1970 election.

He appeared on Saturday morning, March 21, 1970, at a breakfast in Springfield, Mo., and in a forceful manner made clear that in the fall elections of 1970 the principal issues to be debated will be: funding for education, including the veto by the President of the appropriations for health and education; improvement of our environment and whether or not there had been adequate appropriations to do the job to clean up our contaminated environment; and, finally, the condition and trend of our economy.

Senator EAGLETON hit hard at the administration's reasons given for the famous veto and then proceeded to point out that the President had engaged in a lot of rhetoric about cleaning up our environment but had never provided any money in the budget to do the job.

Deploring high interest rates and tight money as the medicine for inflation the fact remains prices are not decreasing and last year rose more than any since 1951. The people that are hit the worst are the consumers, small businessman, the farmer, and the homebuyers. Because of the clarity and sound logic of Senator EAGLETON'S remarks, I wanted to share them with my colleagues and readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH OF SENATOR THOMAS F. EAGLETON, SPRINGFIELD, MO., MARCH 11, 1970

As you may have noticed, you have started to feel a little better about being a Democrat recently. It's nature's cure for pernicious Nixonitis—sort of an antidote that builds up in the public bloodstream as a defense against too much showmanship and not enough leadership in the White House.

We Democrats haven't been well. 1968 was a year of bitter factionalism—over Vietnam, over party procedures, over personalities. The usual process of reconciling our separate interests in favor of the national interest had not been completed by election day, and this cost us the White House.

Throughout the campaign there was uncertainty in the minds of many people as to just what the Democratic Party stood for . . . what its goals were . . . whether it still spoke for the average American . . . whether it was democratic enough.

These were painful questions. And they are still not resolved.

But they are precisely the questions which any party must answered over and over if it expects to renew its constituency and win elections.

Today, when you hear that the McGovern Commission on party structure and delegate selection or the O'Hara Commission on party rules has held another hearing . . . or when you hear that the Democratic Policy Council has met in heated debate but finally hammered out a position . . . or when a new chairman is named not by appointment but by hard-nosed compromise . . . and when that Chairman is as widely regarded and highly qualified as Larry O'Brien . . . then I think you are hearing the sounds of rejuvenation and vitality. It's in the air. You can feel it in Washington and you can feel it in this room. And I predict that it will snowball in the next few months.

I think you'll find more and more people willing to work in your precincts . . . more and more people willing to contribute their efforts and their money to Democratic candidates.

You'll see some hard-fought Democratic primaries and conventions this summer; but after the dust has settled, most states will have a kind of Democratic party unity that has lately been out of fashion.

And on November 3, I am convinced that you will see a decisive majority returned to both Houses of Congress, and substantial Democratic victories in states and cities the Republicans have on their safe list today.

Do not expect all the differences within our party to be resolved this year, or by 1972 . . . or ever. And don't expect our party treasury to look like either Fort Knox or the Republican treasury, whichever is greater.

But I do think we Democrats will once again have a clear, confident and progressive message for the American people.

And I think we'll have their support.

You're going to find that Democrats aren't the only ones who need an antidote to Nixonitis.

There is something in the chemistry of a nation, as well as of a party, that craves a higher purpose than a good Neilson rating. It wants leadership which is occasionally willing to be right rather than popular. It wants substance rather than image. It wants frankness and, as we know all too well, it abhors a credibility gap.

Yet after a year, the Madison Avenue crew that put Nixon in the White House is still "selling" the President . . . but neglecting the nation.

They call it "benign neglect." I call it "malign ambivalence"—a policy of coming down squarely on both sides of an issue, along with a plea that "we should be judged by our deeds, not our words."

Let's look at some of their words and deeds.

Laos—Last summer, amidst much fanfare, the President announced the Guai Doctrine, his plan to severely restrict future U.S. military involvement in Asia.

Ever since, there has been a steady escalation in our participation in the Laotian conflict.

Senator Symington held a series of hearings in which he inquired exhaustively into the nature of our involvement in Laos. Since that time, he has fought to obtain the release of even a censored transcript of his hearings, but has been blocked by State Department objections.

As Senator Symington put it recently, we have fought two undeclared wars in the last twenty years and it now appears that we are fighting an undisclosed war.

Education—In 1968 candidate Nixon said his Administration would be second to none in education. But President Nixon has fought Democratic efforts in Congress to provide adequate money for American education every step of the way.

When the President took to television to veto the appropriations for health and education, he singled out inequities in the impacted school aid program as his principal reason. Later, off the screen, he made a deal with Republican Congressional leaders to leave intact a subsequent appropriation for impact aid if he could have discretionary authority to cut back on spending for other programs, such as school libraries. How is this consistent with the "right to read" program he announced last week?

One of the worst examples of the Administration's malign ambivalence strategy occurred in the Senate debate over the Stennis amendment dealing with school desegregation. Republican Senators Scott, and Tower, who were on opposite sides of the amendment, each claimed to be speaking for the Administration. Sure enough, each got a letter from the White House the next day expressing support for their mutually contradictory positions.

Like many issues before us as a nation, school desegregation is an extremely complex and difficult challenge. It will not go away by itself. And if it is going to be handled in an orderly fashion, it demands strong, decisive leadership that doesn't run and hide under the bed between TV shows.

Environment—Congress appropriated $800 million to help states and cities fight water pollution. The Administration apparently considered most of this money to be unnecessary spending—unlike the ABM system and the supersonic transport—and refused to use $600 million of the amount appropriated.

The President and his image makers had a change of heart as they saw the Democratic Party taking the message for a clean environment to an increasingly receptive public. So they made the environmental crisis a central point in his State of the Union address in January and released the $600 million.

In the space of a few months, they managed to claim credit for saving $600 million in wasteful government spending and for investing $600 million in the fight against water pollution—all with the same money.

Economy—Shortly after he took office, President Nixon prescribed high interest rates and tight money as the bitter but necessary medicine for inflation. After fourteen months of this medication, the patient has grown even weaker.

The people taking the medicine—the ones who are being hurt—are not the bankers and the well-financed corporations who can be counted on to contribute generously to Republican causes. They are not the oil men or the steel men or the people who can afford $10,000 Treasury bills. They are the people least able to pay—the consumers, the small businessmen, the farmers, the home buyers . . . people to whom credit is essential but who are unable to pass along 10% or 12% or 18% financing charges to someone else down the line.

Prices aren't decreasing. Last year, they rose more than in any year since 1951. Unemployment reached its highest level in four years and there's every indication that it's going a lot higher.

Protecting the rich and soaking the poor is an eternal verity of Republican policy. People forgot that in 1968. They remember it now.

The President has neither inspired the nation by his words nor moved it by his deeds. And by 1972 the American voters will be ready to seize upon the obvious cure for pernicious Nixonitis.

In the meantime, we can get partial relief by assuring that a Democratic majority is retained in Congress. Right here in Missouri, we can express our confidence in the great work done by Senator Symington and by nine-tenths of our outstanding Missouri Congressional delegation.

They surely deserve our support, our work, and—never forget it—our money. I intend to campaign for them whenever I am able and wherever I am wanted. I urge each of you to lend your help as well.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. ALBERT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I take this time only to advise Members of the House that we will announce next week the program for the business of the House for the following week—the week of April 6.

I want to make it clear, also, that barring business of an emergency nature, we plan to schedule no business for the House of Representatives until Tuesday, April 7. If an emergency develops requiring the presence of Members, we will attempt to give all Members at least 48 hours notice.

UNITED STATES DEFERS SALE OF JETS TO ISRAEL

(Mr. LOWENSTEIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LOWENSTEIN, Mr. Speaker, millions of Americans are outraged and astonished by President Nixon's decision to defer the sale of jet planes to Israel. There is no corresponding delay in arms delivery to the Arab States. To the contrary, last week, following in the wake of confirmation of the French sale of jets to Libya, an undisclosed number of surface-to-air missiles were delivered to the United Arab Republic by the Soviet Union. Thus the American failure to sell Israel weapons needed for her defense produces a sort of unilateral arms freeze that must encourage the Arab States to expect to gain a military superiority in due course that will make it unnecessary ever to sit down to negotiate with Israel.

With this one irresponsible decision the U.S. Government has managed to weaken Israel's military position at precisely the wrong moment, and in the process to make peace in the Middle East even more remote.

I shall discuss this situation at greater length in the near future, but I cannot allow this day to pass without protesting grotesque and astonishing miscarriage of good sense and justice.

BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

(Mr. DANIELS of New Jersey asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DANIELS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, once again, we are commemorating the valiant efforts of the Byelorussian people to achieve freedom for the Byelorussian Republic.

Today is the 52d anniversary of the declaration of independence of the Byelorussian people. Time after time these heroic people have attempted, in the face of systematic conquest, persecution, and tyranny, to throw off their oppressors and live as a free people.

Even in the face of oppression, however, the Byelorussian people have protected their culture and history and their spirit remains strong and resolute.

Mr. Speaker, I know I speak for all freedom-loving people in pledging our constant support for the valiant efforts of the Byelorussian people in their fight for freedom.

EXCHANGE OF LANDS FOR PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H.R. 13448) to authorize the exchange, upon terms fully protecting the public interest, of the lands and buildings now constituting the U.S. Public Health Service Hospital at New Orleans, La., for lands upon which a new U.S. Public Health Service Hospital at New Orleans, La., may be located, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Page 1, lines 6 and 7, strike out "administrators of the Tulane educational fund" and insert "Administrators of the Tulane Educational Fund".

Page 2, line 6, strike out "administrators of the Tulane educational fund" and insert "Administrators of the Tulane Educational Fund".

Page 2, lines 14 and 15, strike out "administrators of the Tulane educational fund" and insert "Administators of the Tulane Educational Fund".

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object, I hope—listening to the amendments and the changes in the bill, I take it that the amendments are all germane to this bill.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. The gentleman is correct. The amendments are germane. It is simply changing the title of the Tulane Educational Fund.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TAKE PRIDE IN AMERICA

(Mr. MILLER of Ohio asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. MILLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, today we should take note of America's great accomplishments and in so doing renew our faith and confidence in ourselves as individuals and as a nation. In 1967 the United States produced 18,171,000,000,000 cubic feet of marketable natural gas. This was approximately 65 percent of the world total. The Soviet Union was second producing 18 percent of the world total.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

MARCH 26, 1970.

The Honorable SPEAKER,
U.S. House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a sealed envelope addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives from the President of the United States, received in the Clerk's Office at 4:20 p.m., on Wednesday, March 25, 1970, and said to contain a message from the President transmitting the Manpower Report of the President.

With kind regards, I am
Sincerely yours,
W. PAT JENNINGS,
Clerk,
By W. RAYMOND COLLEY.

FIRST MANPOWER REPORT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 91-287)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed with illustrations:

To the Congress of the United States:

This first Manpower Report of my Administration recounts the major developments in employment and unemployment during 1969 and the progress we made in that year in reshaping and strengthening existing manpower programs. The report also discusses the contributions of manpower programs to the country's crucial economic objectives—controlling inflation and limiting and mitigating any rise in unemployment.

Despite the significant advances described in this report, our experience during this past year has substantiated what I said last August when I proposed a new Manpower Training Act. I said then that the inefficiencies inherent in the present patchwork of manpower programs were intolerable and that a new legislative approach to manpower problems was in order. I proposed specific reforms at that time and I take this opportunity to urge, once again, their prompt enactment.

Other important topics treated in this Manpower Report include the need for improvements in our Unemployment Insurance system and for fundamental reform of our welfare system. Clearly, these institutions require basic reform if we are to be effective in preventing as well as relieving poverty. I again ask the Congress to act in these significant areas.

Full opportunity for all citizens remains a central goal for this nation. To achieve that goal will require exceptionally well-constructed and well-administered manpower programs. We have made much progress toward that end in the last year, progress which is detailed in this document. But there is still a great deal to do—and this report is especially valuable because it clarifies and underscores these challenges.

RICHARD NIXON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 25, 1970.

TO PRESERVE A MEMORY

(Mr. CONYERS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to join with the distinguished gentlewoman from Massachusetts (Mrs. HECKLER) in introducing legislation that would provide for the issuance of a gold medal to the widow of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and the furnishing of duplicate medals in bronze to Morehouse College and the King Family Memorial Center. These bills are offered in conjunction with Senator HUGH SCOTT and Senator EDWARD BROOKE, who today will introduce similar legislation in the Senate. I am hopeful that the bipartisan support in this effort will hasten passage of the bill.

As a trustee of the King Family Center, I know what a great tribute the issuance of these medals would be. The inscription on the reverse side of them—Justice-Peace-Brotherhood—are goals which we all must work toward so that some day Dr. King's dream will be a reality for all Americans. Through our work, and by this tribute, the memory of this great leader will be preserved.

AUTHORIZING RECESS TO BE CALLED TODAY

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order at any time this afternoon for the Speaker to declare a recess subject to the call of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

WORLD HABEAS CORPUS

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. PUCINSKI) is recognized for 60 minutes.

(Mr. PUCINSKI asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a resolution cosponsored by six Members of this House, requesting the administration to direct the U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations to call upon the General Assembly and the Secretariat and request the convening of an international convention for the purpose of drafting and adopting a World Habeas Corpus Treaty-Statute and make it available for ratification by member signatory states of the United Nations.

Alternatively, and for implementation, we urge the administration to initiate the calling of a conference of the members of the Atlantic Community and the Organization of American States for the purpose of regionally adopting and ratifying such a treaty-statute of world habeas corpus.

If the United States were to take this bold step of championing world habeas corpus as the buckler and shield of individual liberty we would reassume the initiative of capturing the imagination of mankind and, in the words of Tom Paine, we would again make "the cause of America the cause of mankind."

World habeas corpus is a step toward the strengthening of world community and the attainment of world peace. It is a practical step in the evolution of world law. As the late great President John F. Kennedy stated:

> Let us focus instead on a more practical, more attainable peace, based not on a sudden revolution in human nature but on a gradual evolution in human institutions—on a series of concrete actions and effective agreements which are in the interest of all concerned . . . For peace is a process, a way of solving problems.

The proposal for world habeas corpus was originally suggested by Luis Kutner, a Chicago lawyer and internationally acclaimed innovator in national and international law. In the wake of the rise of the Nazi dictatorship and the goose step trampling of human rights, Kutner, conceived of making the hallowed English common law remedy, which stems from the Magna Carta, into an international remedy by which an individual, who is arbitrarily detained or imprisoned, may, after exhausting all recourse to municipal law, seek international relief.

The story of how this idea has developed has been well told in an article by Dr. Ernest Katin, a lawyer and political scientist, in the winter-spring 1969 issue of the University of Miami Law Review and by the internationally renowned Prof. Harold D. Lasswell of the Yale Law School in a paper which is to be published in a symposium on world habeas corpus by the University of Miami Press.

When Mr. Kutner first proposed world habeas corpus, he was met by silence and indifference. The notion that individuals were to be protected by international law or that human rights was an international concern was not generally accepted. But he attracted the support of Roscoe Pound, who became his mentor in propagating the proposal. Noted scholars like John Dewey were attracted to the cause. He soon received the support and active cooperation of Harold D. Lasswell, Myres S. McDougal, Quincy Wright, and the then U.S. Attorney General, Francis Biddle. The late George Cardinal Mundelein reacted enthusiastically. Kutner, pursuing this cause, expended his own funds and convened conferences of distinguished scholars and jurists to develop the concept of world habeas corpus. The Commission for International Due Process of Law was formed as a tax exempt, nonprofit corporation under the laws of the State of Illinois. Dean Roscoe Pound was honorary counsel, Hans Kelsen is now honorary counsel. The world policy and executive committees consist of such well-known personages as Associate Supreme Court Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., Judge Caroline Simon of New York, General Telford Taylor, Louis B. Sohn, and Egon Schwelb. Chief Justices and other jurists throughout the world have joined as sponsors with seminars having been held in India, Hong Kong, Japan, Taiwan, Greece, France, Italy, and elsewhere. The Commission is now affiliated with the World Peace Through Law Center and has the support of the American Bar Association.

The concept of world habeas corpus has been extensively elaborated in numerous scholarly publications, national, and international, and in a book by Kutner, entitled "World Habeas Corpus," which was published by Oceana.

World habeas corpus is a legal ligament for international order in providing protection for the individual as a subject of international law. It is premised on the concept that man, as the subject of international law, should have his individual security guaranteed by an international treaty-statute enforceable by a competent rule of law. It involves no impairment of the sovereignity of states. The proposal does not in any way involve the setting up of a world government.

The proposal for world habeas corpus is based on the premise that human rights is a shared value for world order.

International law and practice has manifested a growing concern for human rights.

International concern for human rights was first expressed in efforts to outlaw slavery, expressions of humanitarian concern with respect to the persecution of Jews and in the development of the Rules of War. Following the end of World War I international protection of human rights was further expressed in the minorities treaties, the League of Nations mandates and the conventions of the International Labor Organization.

Following World War II, human rights and the individual received new international recognition with the Nuremberg Charter and the trial of Nazi and Japanese war criminals. When individuals can be made personally responsible for violations of international law, it logically follows that they have rights in international law which they should be permitted to assert and which is buttressed by a summary, effective legal remedy.

The signatories to the United Nations Charter obligated themselves to promote the universal respect for the observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms. These rights and freedoms were codified by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which was adopted unanimously by the General Assembly of the United Nations and has been reaffirmed continuously in a series of resolutions.

The protection of human rights has been furthered by the adoption of the United Nations Covenant on Political and Civil Rights. Article 9 of the Declaration on Human Rights and the Covenant affirms that "everyone has the right to liberty and security of person" and "no one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention."

The protection of human rights has also been affirmed with the adoption of the International Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Racial Discrimination and in expressions of United Nations concern regarding the trampling of human dignity in the imposition of apartheid in South Africa and the policies of suppression in the Portuguese colonies in Africa.

In addition to United Nations action, human rights has been furthered by the adoption of regional conventions, including the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and the Declaration of the Rights of Man of the Organization of American States. Of most significance is the European declaration which contains provisions for enforcement through a commission.

Enforcement procedures have constituted a serious gap in the law of international human rights. The United Nations Covenant on the Eliminations of all Forms of Racial Discrimination and the Covenant on Political and Civil Rights contain but limited and halting provisions for enforcement.

Would habeas corpus provide the means for the filling of this vacuum. As the Honorable Arthur J. Goldberg has perceived:

> The idea of worldwide habeas corpus, internationally recognized and enforceable in an appropriate international court, can only be applauded by those who are dedicated to the rule of law and the attainment of lasting world peace. For the very term "rule of law" or "due process of the law" implies a procedure such as habeas corpus; a means whereby official detention can be challenged and, if not justified on the basis of valid laws, terminated. Without this simple procedural mechanism, many of the substantive rights that have been recognized as so important in the cause of peace must remain little more than mere aspirations. With the advent of international habeas corpus, and the universal respect for human rights that it would encourage, a long stride toward a peaceful world would be taken.

As Sir Winston Churchill well perceived, "world habeas corpus is the difference between civilization and tyranny."

It is, in the words of Justice Kotaro Tanaka of the International Court of Justice, "a most elementary and primary necessity or condition sine qua non of the world community that there shall exist no vacuum in the world in regard to the habeas corpus and that, therefore, the natural law principles of the habeas corpus shall be vested with positive effect as soon as possible."

Our distinguished and learned U.S. Solicitor General, Erwin N. Griswold, former dean of the Law School of Harvard University has stated:

> Luis Kutner has done great work for World Habeas Corpus. If it can be made to grow in strength it can become a mighty power for order and decency and peace in the world.

World habeas corpus embodies adherence to a universal standard of respect for human rights while taking account of cultural diversities. Nine regional circuit courts of world habeas corpus have been proposed to reflect procedures in differing legal and cultural systems staffed with lawyers capable of processing writs of world habeas corpus. There would also exist a world tribunal. Individuals who are arbitrarily detained would, upon exhaustion of all available domestic recourse, have the right to appeal to the appropriate regional tribunal for the adjudication of their rights. The tribunal would be empowered to order the detained person to be brought before it and would determine whether he is being detained in accordance with international due process of law. It would have the authority to order the individual's release upon a finding that the detention did not accord with international standards. The individual would also have a right of appeal to the world tribunal of world habeas corpus.

The world habeas corpus system need not be totally implemented all at once. Conceivably, a group of nations may agree to the formation of a world habeas corpus circuit. The nations of the Atlantic community, or those nations belonging to the common law tradition or situated in the Western Hemisphere may set the process in motion by establishing a circuit. The resolution here presented permits precisely this approach though world circuits are the final goal.

As former Chief Justice Leonard Sutton of the Colorado Supreme Court has observed:

> History teaches us that the progress of the human race has always been one of struggle to achieve the better way of life, more perfect justice and more peaceful existence. The writ of habeas corpus has been one of the most potent weapons yet devised in man's attempt to follow paths to these fundamental and rightful goals. Mankind will somehow, some way, and hopefully very soon, use this ancient, revered and versatile remedy to serve his need for human freedom on an international basis. Surely, Regional International Courts of Habeas Corpus are within reach. Once created and obeyed, they will permit those who in good faith adhere to the precepts of the United Nations Charter, to see to it that at least, in their countries, there is protection against arbitrary arrest and unlawful detenion. Hopefully, this safeguard can gradually be extended to all men everywhere.

Prof. Quincy Wright, a long-time supporter, regards world habeas corpus as "a fundamental requirement of human justice."

The writ of habeas corpus, or analogous writs such as Amparo in the Latin American nations, have been universally adopted as summary remedy for arbitrary arrest. The Honorable Zafrula Khan, former president of the General Assembly of the United Nations and Justice of the International Court of Justice declares that:

> The Writ of World Habeas Corpus is a procedure designed to make effective what has largely come to be known as the rule of law, as a contrast to the arbitrary exercise of executive authority. The Rule of Law is firmly rooted in Islamic jurisprudence, and there is nothing in the concept and procedure of the Writ to create any problem or difficulty for an Islamic State. The whole trend of Muslim juristic thinking lends strong support for the effective safeguards for human freedom.

A petition for a writ of world habeas corpus was filed with the Commission on Human Rights of the United Nations for the release of Associated Press Newsman William N. Oatis from detention by authorities in Czechoslovakia. According to the Honorable John V. Beamer, who was then a member of this House and had labored for Oatis' release, recalled in 1958:

Six years ago, when the Associated Press reporter William N. Oatis was imprisoned illegally by Czechoslovakia, Mr. Kutner cooperated with me in my fight to free Oatis and filed a petition for a U.N. writ of habeas corpus before the Human Rights Commission. It was a debatable legal question whether the petition could be entertained by that body. Tremendous pressures arose for its consideration, but before action was taken, Mr. Oatis made coerced confessions and was released. I believe that the Kutner petition was greatly instrumental in assisting me in speeding Oatis' release.

In 1967 another petition for a writ of world habeas corpus was filed with the Human Rights Commission of the United Nations to obtain the release of former Congo Premier Moise Tshombe following the hijacking of his plane and kidnaping to Algeria. The public attention focused by this petition was a factor in averting the contemplated extradition of Tshombe to the Congo and certain execution. The ultimate death of Tshombe on June 30, 1969, as the forgotten former head of state, is an acute reminder that wrongful imprisonment demands a world remedy where national legal processes are delinquent.

When two Israelis—passengers on a hijacked TWA plane to Damascus—were detained by Syrian authorities, Kutner prepared a petition for a writ of world habeas corpus after consultation with Israel and American authorities. Prior to filing the petition with the United Nations, a copy was sent to the Syrian Ambassador. A legal confrontation developed. A few days later the Israelis were released.

Currently Kutner and the Commission for International Due Process of Law have focused on the oppression of Christians, Muslims, and Jews in the United Arab Republic, Syria, and Iraq. A petition for a writ of world habeas corpus is being prepared on behalf of 70 persons slated for a mock trial and, possible, certain execution in Iraq.

These petitions have contributed the case precedents to blazing the trail for conferring a competent status upon the individual to seek redress before international tribunals.

An institutional remedy for the protection of human rights is most pressing. In many parts of the world human dignity is being trampled upon. In the Soviet Union writers and artists expressing dissenting ideas have been arbitrarily imprisoned and exiled. In Cuba and Haiti, individual rights have been trampled. In Iraq, Christians, Jews, and Muslims have been executed without the semblance of a fair trial. In the United Arab Republic, groups of individuals have been subjected to tortures in prisons reminiscent of Nazi concentration camps. In the Sudan, Christians have been subjected to killing and harassment. The racial policies of South Africa have shocked the conscience of mankind.

The trampling of human rights is an ever-present threat to world peace. The struggle for human rights cannot be suppressed. If no legal recourse is to be provided, these rights will be asserted by no other means. No longer can it be said that human rights is of no international concern. The question is whether to resolve these matters by institutional and legal means or through international anarchy.

World habeas corpus provides the means through the rule of law. The role of world habeas corpus was well described by Associate Justice William J. Brennan of the U.S. Supreme Court:

What is important is the obvious utility of world habeas corpus as a tool for the avoidance of the dangers of the police state, and its great promise as a contribution toward preserving and furthering world peace by repudiating, through an enforceable international rule of law, systematic and deliberate denial of human rights. The plan requires no surrender of national sovereignty to a supranational state and there is more than a feeble hope that the nations of the world would perceive that this plan would indeed serve their national interests . . .

U.S. support for establishing world habeas corpus tribunals would provide hope and confidence as to the securities of individual liberty throughout the world. World habeas corpus would, in the long run, enlist more hundreds of millions of persons in support of the principles of individual freedom than any amount of financial aid that might ever be granted to them by our Nation. World habeas corpus will strengthen the forces of peace and guarantee individuals throughout the world with the personal peace of personal liberty. It will erect a worldwide barrier against the knock on the door at 3 a.m.

As the eminent international law authority, Yale professor Myres S. McDougal, has commented:

It was appropriately urged by the late Judge Hersch Lauterpacht that until "an effective right of petition—which means a right of petition with the right to have it investigated with the view to such action being taken upon it as is necessary—is granted to individuals concerned or to bodies acting in their behalf, any international remedy that may be provided will be deficient in its vital aspect." . . . For the larger community of mankind genuinely aspiring toward improved implementation of human rights the proposal for internationalizing habeas corpus would appear to offer plausible hope for remedying the greatest defect in its present armory of institutional practices. Certainly the United States could have nothing to lose, save its reputation for indifference to the human program, by vigorous and positive action in exploration and promotion of the potentialities that inhere in the World Habeas Corpus proposal.

The rule of law has many images, and it has many spokesmen. In world history, from time to time, it has been ignored or violated by iron-willed, narcissistic, or psychotic rulers; but it is the only ligament that permeates the ever enlarging domain of the purpose and society of man.

The rule of law is not technology, it is not gadgetry of some mysterious cult. Nor is it any forbidding social monster. The evolution of law—rules of conduct that are permissive and prohibitive—is a constant adventure of the human spirit. It seeks to buttress faith in an order of reason out of a chaotic universe of which man is a part in his quest for individual security, opportunity, and meaningful peace.

In other words, the rule of law is a wellspring of human discontent that stirs man to seek more of life than merely a place of abode and to eat and sleep. And that human discontent flames higher with each generation. However, it fails to keep step with advancing scientific, chemical, military, and agricultural technology, albeit though the discontent is nurtured by the desire to realistically contemplate the achievement of the highest of social ideals for the condition and existence of man.

The emergence of the human being as subject and not object of law—domestic or international—is of significance in the current space age explorations of the entire universe and probably the entire galaxy. The accelerating age of science and technology comes to grips with the very nature and purpose of man as to what basically constitutes a good life in a turbulent world society.

While collective science concerns all of mankind, all nations, be they emerged or emerging, or expanding or contracting, recognize the truth that the progress of law, to permit people to live peaceably, productively, and nonhurtfully, is the only durable conquest of the story of humanity in the earthbound and space worlds.

History records the jailing, torture, degradation, and executions of men of science, men of law, and men engaged in "revolutionary activities" who dared to suggest social designs for shaping social and cultural patterns. It is a tragic cliche of a contemporary age to reject the dreams of the progressive thinkers. As genuine revolutionaries, developing cultural patterns and fostering vigorous sciences, explorations, and inventions, men and women have been condemned by a society devoid of discernment to recognize ability or to govern itself rationally and with justice.

The enigma of history has been the relentless pace of progress in the face of obstinate and obsolescent opposition. Since man, with his limited knowledge, is the cause of violence, it is a wonder and excitement that the world has reached the incredible plateau of being able to convene a World General Assembly of United Nations to exchange and debate viewpoints in the quest for peace and the implementation of the security of human rights. The divinity of rulers and the perfection of politicians are no longer dogma or accepted on an absolute basis. It is the constant compliment to man to discover his own inadequacies and to develop the implementations that point to ultimate truths.

Law, being self-revising, recognizes that there is no absolute right or absolute justice, but it does recognize that interpersonal relations between men and nations are connected and responsible to each other. To live comfortably and peaceably with law, it is necessary to live with dynamically changing systems of cultural, national, and political concepts.

Responding to the interpretations of the needs and complexities of mankind, conservative attitudes are necessary to thwart and resist the easy abandonment of national and international concepts of law and religion. Not only are the rule of law and religion constantly subject to change, but its prophets of law and religion for a better world are under challenge themselves.

Organizations, such as the World Peace Through Law Center, International Bar Association, international law committees of national and local bar associations, now enjoy the stimulation of intellectual exchanges dedicated to the end that the collective rule of law be made understandable to the world public. This mutual goal is one of constant education and intellectual discipline. This includes a constant reassessment of governmental obligations to live up to its contracts with its citizens that there be no violation of the human person or the realistic impairment of the sovereignty of nations.

Those engaged in bringing into being the world cultural pattern of the rule of law are a sensitive group. This group is not capricious or whimsical, but is endowed with historical optimism. They have the courage to forcefully tackle the awesome problems of creating an affirmative, behavioral world court. This is the true approaching tide of progress, recognizing that man will always be a small island isolated in a vast hostile sea.

This then is the continuous creation of the men of law, the age of the rule of law. With it comes the promise of what the life of man can be with peace, education, food, adequate housing, and human freedom for all. It leads to a more even balance between individualism and collectivism.

The men of the rule of law for world habeas corpus commit themselves to build a world where mankind will not live at the razor edge of danger. The men of the rule of law have a vital, flexible, and ever-evolving concern about the nature and purpose of man and what constitutes a good life and a good society. It is to them that the human dimension of world habeas corpus is entrusted.

Mr. Speaker, in this age of instant annihilation this beacon light of world habeas corpus for human justice may well be our last hope of preventing the world apocalypse.

The day of world habeas corpus must not be delayed.

As Justice Brennan has stated, Luis Kutner has performed an invaluable service for the world. He has earned the tribute of a grateful mankind.

SUGGESTED STRIKES IN COAL MINE INDUSTRY

(Mr. KEE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. KEE. Mr. Speaker, as the representative in the Congress of the largest coal producing district in the United States and realizing the vital importance of the mining of coal to our Nation and our customers overseas, I am deeply disturbed over suggestions which have been put forth with reference to strikes of our brave and dedicated men who mine the coal.

The suggested strikes would be in violation of a sacred contract between employer and employee, and more importantly should such a strike occur during this period of time when there is a greater demand for coal than production capabilities, such a strike could serve only to destroy the coal industry.

In short, to close down our coal mines would utterly destroy the coal operator, the payroll for the essential employment, would bring about the elimination of jobs of our coal miners, and in addition, the loss to the coal industry would bankrupt every business establishment including the small independent businessman, and all coal producing industries in the United States.

At this point, I would like to include an editorial which appeared in the Welch Daily News, the only daily newspaper in McDowell County, which is the largest coal producing county in the United States, in order that reason will prevail and our men will continue to produce this essential source of energy, without which the United States can not long exist.

The editorial follows:

[From the Welch Daily News, Mar. 11, 1970]

STRIKE WOULD NOT HELP YABLONSKI INVESTIGATIONS

Congressman Ken Hechler's latest public outbursts—hinting for Yablonski supporters to strike—reflects seriously on the man's mental state.

We are sure that if he gives this idea a little more thought, he'll forget about it. The Yablonski sons are also tainted by their speeches about "shutting out the lights" of the entire country.

What happens in the coal fields, for instance, when Yablonski supporters decide to strike and Boyle workers decide to work? Heretofore, coal miners have had one unchangeable trait. They don't cross picket lines. That is, until now.

We can't believe that loyal Boyle supporters, which are in a great majority down this way, would take part in a pro-Yablonski demonstration of any kind.

The end result can only be violence. And lest Hechler forgets, there is nobody more violent than a coal miner around a picket line.

Hechler seems to want to pit these opposing forces against each other to further his own political ambitions—whatever they happen to be. This could develop into a most dangerous situation. We sincerely hope he considers this before his next public outburst.

Secondly, we fail to see how a strike could further the investigation into the Yablonski murders. The only result that we can see is it might force the federal government to move hastily. Justice is never achieved in haste.

Once again we have to say the murders were vile and unthinkable acts. The murderers and those who perpetrated it should be punished to the full extent of the law.

We are not, however, prepared to convict anyone in the public press before a trial is held. The attacks against Tony Boyle are almost as bad as the murders themselves. The Hechler-Yablonski faction has done everything but actually put the gun in Tony's hand. Hechler is guilty of irresponsible utterances that reflect on the entire state. The tragedy of it is, national television is making some sort of a hero out of him.

CONGRESSMAN KEE REPORTS TO THE PEOPLE OF THE FIFTH DISTRICT OF WEST VIRGINIA

(Mr. KEE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. KEE. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time to address the House in order to present my official report to the residents of the Fifth Congressional District of West Virginia, which will cover my legislative activities, as well as to set forth very briefly some of the vital issues faced by the Congress during this extremely critical period in the history of America.

This report covers the first session of the 91st Congress and has been brought up-to-date on these activities during the second session of the 91st Congress.

In order that the people of the Fifth Congressional District of West Virginia may be better informed of my activities as their Congressman during the first session and part of the second session of the 91st Congress I would like to take this opportunity to set forth very briefly an outline of my service, some of the main issues faced by the Congress, and how they were handled.

The first session of the 91st Congress was the longest since 1963 and the sixth longest in history. The session began on January 3 and adjourned December 23, 1969. There were difficulties which naturally arise when a new administration takes office and difficulties inherent in divided control of the Government. These difficulties did not deter us from taking actions necessary to the welfare of the country. They did, however, delay the legislative processes in getting started, and this contributed to the extraordinary length of the first session. I am pleased to report that my record of attendance is one of the best in the Congress. My officially recorded attendance record on both voting and rollcalls of the House is 94 percent out of a possible 100 percent. I also voted hundreds of additional votes which were taken either by voice, division, or teller.

In analyzing the record of the first session, as well as part of the second, I think it is fair to state that this was a Congress that displayed considerable responsibility.

For example, in response to the near constitutional crisis resulting from the 1968's presidential election, the House acted to modernize the process by which the American people elect their President and Vice President. In a historic action, the House on September 18 passed an amendment to the Constitution which will provide, upon passage by the Senate and ratification by the necessary number of States, for direct election of the President and Vice President. This action to abolish the electoral college, which has elected the President since the beginning of the Republic, meets with the approval of fully 80 percent of the American public. I think the House was well advised in its action.

The temper of the American people had penetrated this body. Questions of national priority have been of great concern to Members of the House. Hence, we witnessed during the first session a diligent scrutiny of military spending and reassessment of expenditures in the domestic area. The 1969 session faced the reality of inflation and spiraling increases in the cost of living. The mood of the country has expressed clear evidence of discontent over high taxes and inflation. With the Vietnam war still going on, inflation is an even more serious problem than it was in 1968.

Legislation ranging over a large spectrum of problems facing the average American citizen were considered and enacted during the months it has been in session. Such issues as tax reform, inflation, environmental and conservation measures, crime and law enforcement, education, national defense, draft lottery, electoral college reform, health, including the all-important Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969, medicaid, housing, unemployment compensation, social security benefits, as well as the needs of our veterans.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

The conflict in Vietnam, of course, dominated congressional thinking in the area of foreign affairs. Congress provided the necessary tools for our fighting forces in Vietnam while cooperating with the President in his efforts to conclude the war. The defense appropriations measures for fiscal year 1970 totaled $69.64 billion, a substantial reduction in the administration's budget, but still the largest money bill of this session. This total represents the biggest cut in defense appropriations since the Korean war. These funds will enable our military forces to maintain national security. The reductions made will, at the same time, support the fight against inflation.

On November 4, 1969, I cosponsored a resolution endorsing President Nixon's efforts to secure a "just" peace in Vietnam. Speaker JOHN MCCORMACK stated that the passage of this resolution, which was approved on December 2, gave additional support to the principle of free elections in Vietnam. Another important provision of this resolution called upon the North Vietnamese Government to abide by the Geneva Convention of 1949 in the treatment of prisoners of war.

Criticism of the draft system led the President to request that Congress remove the prohibition against a draft lottery. This we did. Under the random-selection method, each eligible young man enters a lottery pool during his 19th year. If he is not drafted that year, it is very unlikely that he ever will be. By utilizing the lottery system, we have eliminated one of the major criticisms of the previous draft system—the extended period during which a young man has been kept in doubt about probable induction into the military.

Congress has taken cognizance of the complex domestic problems facing our country in this past year.

TAXES

The most significant Tax Reform Act in the history of our country cleared the Congress just prior to adjournment. It is a judicious mix of reform and relief. It includes a whole new concept in the tax law, a "minimum tax" aimed at preventing wealthy individuals or corporations from completely escaping the Federal income tax. It passed the House 394 to 30 on August 6 and was signed into law December 30, 1969.

CRIME AND LAW ENFORCEMENT

One of the most important problems facing the American people today is the steady increase in crime. With a growing crime rate that amounts to a national disgrace, it is fitting that Congress, which handles the legislation on this subject, should conduct its own studies and recommend corrective measures. In this connection, a select committee to study crime in the United States was created by the House of Representatives on May 1, 1969. Seven Members of the House, designated by the Speaker, were authorized to conduct a full and complete investigation of all aspects of crime in the United States. I am pleased to report that I was a cosponsor on this resolution.

On behalf of law enforcement officers I have introduced legislation to extend benefits to those not employed by the United States who are killed or totally disabled in the line of duty, as well as encouraging States and units of local government to provide civil service coverage for all law enforcement personnel other than elected officials. It is my hope that Congress will act on this legislation during this session.

HEALTH

In the first session, Congress took a strong step to strengthen protection for the health and safety of the more than 144,000 coal miners in the United States. Clearly, if we are to have any impact on the high accident rate, we need a law that gives the broader enforcement powers to the inspector and thereby provides stronger incentives for management and labor to think of safety at all times. I am happy to report that I introduced legislation dealing with these problems. I also testified before the committee on this legislation. By so doing, my bill, H.R. 9850, which provides for the payment of benefits for death or total disability due to pneumoconiosis—or black lung—was incorporated into the Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969, which was signed into law on December 30, 1969, under title IV.

This legislation imposes immediately a dust ceiling of a 4.5 milligrams per cubic meter of air and requires that it be reduced to 3 milligrams in 6 months. By setting limits on the amount of coal dust permitted in a mine, we have curtailed the threat of black lung disease, incurable and a major cause of death. Another key provision permits further development of health and safety standards by administrative action without further legislation and provides for a panel of Federal officials to hear requests from coal operators for more time to comply with health and safety standards, as well as the liberal compensation for miners suffering from this incurable disease as provided by my bill, H.R. 9850, under title IV.

At the same time I introduced a bill to amend the Social Security Act to make provision for the payment of benefits to coal miners afflicted with pneumoconiosis, as well as to disabled railroad employees. H.R. 10499 would also extend the medicare program to individuals receiving cash benefits based on disability without regard to their age. This legislation is at the present time under consideration by the House Ways and Means Committee.

With the acceptance of public responsibility for new health services, the House extended for 3 years the present program of matching grants to the States for construction and modernization of health facilities. We also established a new program of Federal guarantees for loans made for construction or modernization of public or nonprofit private hospitals and other health facilities, with an added provision for an interest subsidy on such loans. Appropriations of $937.3 million over the 3-year period were authorized to include $405 million for hospital construction grants, $165 million in modernization grants, and $300 million for construction of facilities for long-term care, diagnosis and treatment, and rehabilitation.

Since the inception of this program, over $3 billion in Federal funds have been matched by slightly over $7.2 billion in non-Federal funds, leading to the construction and expansion of over 9,800 facilities. These projects have provided 425,000 inpatient care beds in hospitals and nursing homes, and have provided approximately 2,800 other health facilities such as public health centers, diagnostic and treatment centers, and rehabilitation facilities.

There is no question of the continuing need for correcting serious deficiencies in the area of health and patient care and Congress during this session passed legislation aimed at correcting these deficiencies.

The House also approved subsidies to State and local school districts to provide free or reduced-cost breakfast and lunch programs in elementary and secondary schools; increased the authorization to encourage the consumption of milk in schools; and increased funds available for child nutrition programs, to provide food services for children in need. I supported this legislation.

HOUSING

We have strengthened incentives for urban renewal by extending for 1 year most major housing programs in the authorization of $4.8 billion, by the passage of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1969, on October 23, 1969, by a vote of 339 to 9. This amount provides an additional thrust to current Federal efforts to make more housing available to low-income families by requiring that displaced families be provided decent housing.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Recognizing the plight of our older citizens whose fixed incomes are being ravaged by inflation, the Congress has provided for an across-the-board increase of 15 percent in social security benefits. Since social security payments were increased a year and a half ago, the cost of living has increased 10 percent. However, the token increase at that time left the majority of social security recipients living on incomes below the subsistence level. At present there is no provision in their benefits for escalation in line with the steady increase in the cost of living. Meanwhile the sources of income for older Americans are limited and full-time employment exceedingly difficult to find.

These citizens cannot be blamed for their plight and they should not be required to suffer as they do now. At present there are 1.2 million elderly social security recipients who must rely on old-age assistance. The average social security benefit is less than one-third of the $3,900 which the Bureau of Labor Statistics says is necessary for a modest standard of living. The 15-percent increase means that the approximately 25 million people benefiting from social security payments can enjoy a more adequate standard of living. These include not only our senior citizens, but widows with minor children and disabled veterans as well.

LABOR

In the field of labor, the Congress provided for the collection of Federal unemployment taxes on a quarterly basis, as well as legislation to promote health and safety in the construction industry in all Federal or federally financed or federally assisted construction projects. This legislation requires that no construction contractor or subcontractor may require an employee to work under any conditions that are unsanitary, hazardous, or dangerous to his health or safety.

H.R. 14705, a bill to extend unemployment insurance to, first, workers in agricultural processing activities; second, employees of nonprofit organizations; third, employees of State hospitals and universities; and fourth, employees of an American employer, who perform services outside of the United States, passed the House by a vote of 337 to 8 on November 13, 1969, and was reported out of the Senate Finance Committee on March 19, 1970.

VETERANS

The House of Representatives, in passing House Resolution 661, voted to commend the American serviceman and veteran of Vietnam for his efforts and sacrifices and let him know that Members of the House, regardless of their opinions about the national policy concerning the conflict, take note of the bravery and dedication in the service of his country that the American serviceman has exhibited.

The 91st Congress has likewise acted to meet its responsibilities to our veterans. Its actions have been in marked contrast to the position of the executive branch. The Nixon administration has opposed all congressionally initiated veterans bills, rejecting a proposal to use veteran-owned insurance funds for veterans home loans for returning Vietnam veterans killed or who died of service-connected causes, rejecting housing payment increases for paralyzed and other seriously disabled veterans, and asked that action to increase insurance for servicemen in Vietnam be deferred.

During the past year over the objections of the Nixon administration we also acted to provide increased compensation for veterans' survivors. Public Law 91–96 changes the formula.

Although almost a million Vietnam veterans each year are being returned to civilian life, Mr. Nixon's Budget Director cut $41 million in VA hospital modernization funds, including 17 million which would have air-conditioned VA hospitals. Also cut was $4 million for States to modernize soldiers' homes. One of the most glaring examples of action contrary to words was the Nixon administration's cut of $11 million for medical education and research and a reduction of 4,000 medical personnel below that recommended in January—although the administration decried "massive health crisis" at a Presidential press conference on July 10. This "massive health crisis" did not deter the administration from broad and sweeping cuts in practically every area of medical and health research just at a time when they are becoming most productive, nor disapproving personnel to man over $16 million of modern lifesaving equipment standing idle in Federal hospitals.

In an effort to prevent any recipients of non-service-connected pensions or parents receiving dependency and indemnity compensation from losing their VA benefits because of the recently enacted 15-percent increase in social security benefits, I joined with the chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee in introducing legislation to increase the monthly benefits, as well as increase the annual income limitations. It is my hope that this legislation will receive favorable consideration within the very near future.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

In the continual fight for economic development a total of $1,219 million was authorized to extend programs for regional development; $268.5 million for nonhighway programs; $275 million for the other five regional commissions; and $525 million for other economic development programs administered under the Economic Development Administration.

As a Member of the House of Representatives my assignments on the House Public Works Committee include membership on the Special Subcommittee on Economic Development Programs and the Ad Hoc Subcommittee on Appalachia. These subcommittees are directly concerned with Appalachia and economic development, where I served as a cosponsor on these legislative measures, which have been of utmost help to West Virginia.

It was through the Appalachian regional program that provision was made for Federal participation and the construction of Appalachian regional highways, as well as other programs, such as hospital construction, health services, water and sewerage improvements. Under the Economic Development Administration Act, which has a field office in Oak Hill, both grants and long-term, low-interest-rate loans are provided for the establishment of private enterprise. The Fifth Congressional District of West Virginia established the very first multi-county economic corporation in the United States with headquarters in Bluefield.

POVERTY

We in the Congress recognize the need for strong governmental action to attack these problems of poverty and we have shown awareness of the need for substantial resources that must be committed to fight it. The Economic Opportunity Act was extended for 2 years. Sufficient success has been achieved by OEO in its experimental operation in the coordination of Federal agencies. Its services were never designed to be all inclusive and long range in the war on poverty, but to initiate programs which would immediately lift poor people out of poverty—programs which require governmental subsidies. These subsidies total $2,195 billion for fiscal 1970 and $2,295 billion for fiscal 1971. Programs to which funding applies are Headstart, Follow Through, legal services, comprehensive health, emergency and food and medical program, family planning, senior opportunities, alcoholic recovery, and drug rehabilitation.

At present, about 25,400,000 persons, representing 13 percent of the population, live in virtual poverty. Of this large poverty population 42 percent are children, under 18, and 18 percent are elderly, over 65.

On November 13, 1969, the President approved House Joint Resolution 934 which authorizes $610 million for the food stamp program. This law does not change the program itself, but provides the Secretary of Agriculture with funds to deal with the problems of hunger and malnutrition. Congress is considering other legislation to alter the food stamp program so that it may more efficiently eliminate these problems which plague too many Americans.

EDUCATION

In the all-important field of education it was the Congress rather than the administration which asserted the leadership in the actual appropriation of funds for education. There is a pressing need for this Federal assistance to education in the United States. Congress has recognized that local authorities require significant outside assistance in providing disadvantaged students with the educational equipment they must have to become participating, contributing citizens in our society.

President Nixon's budget had provided a request of $370 million below that of the Johnson administration. Congress by way of contrast acted to increase the Nixon request by over $1 billion for education. Regrettably, the President has criticized the Congress for its proeducation stance and not only ordered the increased funds withheld from spending, but has actually ordered education expenditures to be reduced below those of last year.

Nevertheless, we have continued to meet the challenges by providing adequate assistance to education in America by extending the Elementary and Secondary Act which passed the House on April 23, 1969, by a vote of 400 to 17. Without the 2-year extension of the 1965 act, local and State authorities would have been denied the program continuity and advance funding required for proper financial planning.

The House Veterans' Affairs Committee began hearings on June 25 on an increase in educational benefits for Vietnam veterans. A bill was reported from the committee on July 10 and passed the House over the objections of the administration on August 4. H.R. 11959, which has been in conference, is expected to pass the Senate on Monday, March 23, and sent to the White House despite the risk of a possible veto by President Nixon.

DRUG ABUSE

Drug abuse in the United States is reaching alarming proportions with young people—whether living in our urban slums, in our affluent suburbs, or in small towns—experimenting with drugs ranging all the way from marihuana to heroin.

One of the best ways to combat the problem is through a frank and straightforward presentation of the facts. No solution is more reasonable than education, through Federal grants and contracts to local educational agencies.

Realizing the gravity of this addiction problem the House on October 31, 1969, by a unanimous vote of 290 to 0 passed a long-needed Drug Abuse Education Act of 1969 which authorizes $29 million over 3 years for Federal grants to train teachers, lawmen, and other officials who, in turn, will carry truth about the drug misuse to children and their parents.

ENVIRONMENT AND CONSERVATION

The National Environmental Policy Act of 1969, which became law on January 1, 1970, is one of the most important and far-reaching environmental and conservation measures acted upon by Congress in recent years. This measure, which provides new approaches in dealing with environmental problems on a preventive and anticipatory basis, is a significant starting point in the task of renewing our environment. It makes clear that Congress is responsive to the needs of present and future generations of Americans.

On March 9, 1970, I am pleased to report that I cosponsored a joint resolution for the purpose of establishing a Joint Committee To Study Environment and Technology to assure full congressional focus on the total environmental situation.

We have also responded to public demands to alleviate the threat of pollution, both water and air. As a result Congress has appropriated triple the administration request funding water pollution control grants, including sewage treatment plants administered by the Interior Department. The omnibus clear water bill establishes standards for cleaning up the Nation's waterways and preventing further water pollution by upgrading water quality standards across the Nation and setting controls on sewage emanating from vessels which foul many of the Nation's marinas, harbors, and ports.

Congress acted on the problem of air pollution control and abatement by authorizing $45 million, fiscal 1970, for extension of the Clean Air Act of 1967. Pressed by the Nation's need for practical solutions to the very serious air pollution problems, renewed emphasis has been given to research concerning the effects of fuel combustion and motor vehicle exhaust. The future success of air pollution abatement depends on the development of adequate control technology, essential not only to reduce the atmospheric emissions from existing sources, but also to counteract the increasing number of new sources.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

The 91st Congress extended the life of the National Commission on Product Safety through June 30, 1970. In doing so it recognized the importance of the contributions made by the commission as a result of its studies of hazardous merchandise and its subsequent recommendations to Congress for additional consumer-protection legislation.

We also passed the Child Protection and Toy Safety Act of 1969 which amends the existing act to include protection of children from toys which are hazardous due to electrical, mechanical, or thermal hazards.

MISCELLANEOUS

I have been vitally interested in trying to help solve many other problems affecting the good people of the Fifth Congressional District of West Virginia, as well as other citizens living throughout this Nation. As a result, I have introduced legislation to authorize a survey of the Gauley River and tributaries in West Virginia, in the interest of flood control, water supply, and recreation; a bill to provide for the renewal and extension of certain sections of the Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965; a bill to encourage the growth of international trade on a fair and equitable basis; a bill providing for Federal railroad safety; a bill to amend the Public Health Service Act so as to add to such act a new title dealing especially with kidney disease and kidney-related diseases; a bill to amend the Social Security Act to provide disability insurance benefits for the blind; cosponsored a concurrent resolution concerning prisoners of war or missing in action; resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution extending the right to vote to citizens 18 years of age or older; as well as concurrent resolution for the promotion of peace in the Middle East.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion permit me to state these and other activities and concerns of your Congressman are matters which have made it a welcomed opportunity and a high privilege to serve in this office in the 91st Congress. I have tried, to the best of my ability, to render conscientious service to our district.

PRIVATE ENTERPRISE CAN PLAY AN IMPORTANT PART IN POSTAL REFORM

(Mr. CARTER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, the elephantine labors to reform the Post Office Department has brought forth a mouse built to Government specifications and has created great interest not only among my colleagues but among taxpayers as well. The monopolistic authority of the Post Office Department has not been questioned. It seems as if "reform" has taken on a very limited definition, that instead of meaning "to make over," it means "adjust" or "rearrange." The proposals submitted to us for consideration are interesting and have suggested new procedures which should be followed but they have not gone far enough. They are remodeling the Post Office Department, not reforming it.

This Nation has witnessed thousands of programs which were the answer to any assortment of problems because they contained a million or billion dollar price tag and Federal intervention. We have also witnessed the regretful announcement that for some reason yet to be determined these programs failed to meet expectations. One reason for this is that legislative myopia has prevented Congress from looking beyond the walls of the Federal agencies. The time has now come for us to look to private enterprise for assistance. We have already done this in our efforts to combat poverty, urban renewal, job training, health care, and other areas. The lessons learned in these misadventures must be applied to our efforts to correct problems within the Post Office Department. This raises two questions which will be discussed herein. First, why is there a postal monopoly, and second, would private enterprise enter into the postal enterprise to the public's general advantage?

Postal monopolies developed with the national monarchies during the European Renaissance. England retained the monopoly because they feared the postal system could be used for treasonous purposes and even then its use by private citizens was discouraged. It later developed into a profitable operation and the royalty permitted his favorite subjects to manage it for their own profit. This is the form by which the colonies were introduced to it and it has remained remarkably similar for these centuries. The Articles of Confederation gave Congress "the sole and exclusive right and power of—establishing and regulating post offices" thus a monopoly. The Federal Constitution of 1789 provides that Congress shall have power "to establish post offices and post roads," and it is interesting to note that the clause "sole and exclusive right and power" was eliminated. It seems, therefore, that those responsible for the Constitution elected to abolish the monopoly as a constitutional mandate, although one of the first acts of Congress was to pass an act which provided that "the regulations of the Post Office shall be the same as they last were under the resolutions and ordinances of the late Congress." That law has henceforth been interpreted by the U.S. Supreme Court as establishing a postal monopoly. There was clearly a need for a monopoly at that time; for private enterprise, in its beginning, could not meet the need and any postal service would have had to be protected from competition. The Post Office Department with its monopolistic powers was created and the tone was set for years to come, for in its first year it ended up in the red.

The next major postal legislation was in 1792, which prohibited any private person from carrying any letters for hire, or from setting up a private post for hire or any post road, or by vessel if such would damage the post office's revenue. The emphasis was not on protection from competition but only from competition that threatens the revenue.

Private enterprise began developing and they found loopholes in this and subsequent legislation which permitted it to enter into mail delivery services. The most common illustration of these enterprises is pony express. In arguing for more restrictive legislation, the Postmaster General in 1843 submitted the following statement to support the postal monopoly:

> These private expresses will only be found to operate upon the great and profitable thoroughfares between great commercial points, whilst the extremes are left to depend upon the operations of the United States mail, crippled and broken down for the want of means.

This same argument was used in England and has been repeated ever since, and in some ways I find it consoling to read in the Kappel report a similar statement in defense of the monopoly:

> The postal service is particularly vulnerable to 'cream-skimming' in the high-volume, high-value segments of its market, e.g., delivery within or between downtown business districts of major cities. It would probably be uneconomic for the Post Office to meet competition by offering a reduced rate for such service because of the additional costs of administering a rate scheme split along geographic lines. The competitor would then be able to serve the low-cost segment of the market, leaving the Post Office to handle the high-cost services. Under such competition the Post Office would lose lucrative portions of its business, increasing its average unit cost and requiring higher prices to all users.

It is comforting, however, only in the sense that the President's Commission either held a certain spot in its heart for history or a sense of humor in that they felt the same situation exists today as that in 1843.

Congress responded to this plea from the Postmaster General and enacted restrictive legislation that absolutely forbids the regular delivery of mail regardless of the method for conveyance. This is essentially the position of the Post Office Department today, so it seems as if the postal monopoly was created out of necessity and that it has continuously been protected from competition that threatened its revenue. Justifications for protective legislation was merely a financial consideration and no concern was given to whether the public enjoyed better service by these enterprising companies.

The Kappel report cites two reasons justifying postal monopoly. One reason was previously cited and will be discussed at greater length later. The other reason was given by attempting to draw an analogous situation between public utilities and the Post Office Department. To illustrate this, a situation was referred to wherein a community is served by two telephone companies, and it was their purpose to show how ridiculous this would be for the customer who would either be required to have two instruments or be limited to the number of other patrons they could reach. What, in fact, such an illustration points out is the failure of the President's Commission to understand utilities and how they work together. In my own district, a county and a commercial area are serviced by two telephone companies. Patrons of neither system are required to have two instruments, nor do they have limitations on whom they telephone at normal rates. These companies have worked together for the benefit of everyone in that area and the same idea can apply to postal service. The Post Office Department is not a natural monopoly and opening it to competition does not necessarily mean inefficient duplication of services.

The second justification given by the Kappel report, as previously mentioned, is the vulnerability of the Post Office Department to competition and the fear competition would concentrate on deliveries within or between downtown business districts of major cities. Such reasoning is illogical and based on cliches rather than on facts. It is common knowledge that the most inefficient and wasteful element of the Post Office Department is its service to large urban areas and one would think that the Department would welcome assistance, but it does not. It seems as if the Department would rather contribute its losses to these areas with one hand and hold them in the other as a profitable venture which is needed to offset losses elsewhere. It may also be possible that the Department does not mean service to the entire community but only to that which originates and terminates within a few blocks of each point. If this is the case, then the Department is presenting a very small part of the whole operation as justification for it all, and surely it would not present this as justification.

The only remaining justification for a postal monopoly to be explored is the theory that private enterprise cannot do an adequate job and that even if it were permitted to compete, it would concentrate on the high-volume, high-value segments of the market. The time has now come to cease using cliches made popular in Victorian England and evaluate private enterprise of the 1970's—to see if it can handle the mail and offer a public service. Even though there is a Federal monopoly, several private companies have come into existence in recent years which afford interested parties an opportunity to review their operations and determine for themselves what these companies can do. The largest of these companies began in the Midwest a few years ago and instead of reporting a deficit in its first year, it reported large capital gains. It did this not by concentrating on high value mail but by delivery of third-class mail, commonly referred to as "junk mail," by the Department. They did this by promising and delivering service which was more efficient and more economical than what the Post Office Department could offer. They claim to deliver mail at a rate of about 42 percent of what the Department charges and to do it faster with more dependability. It is left to one's imagination what they could do in the delivery of mail which the Department terms profitable. There are entrepreneurs waiting on the sidelines with plans to utilize modern technology which is necessary to bring postal service into the 20th century and they are willing to assume the complete responsibility of delivery service to the larger communities in the Nation.

Those who would have you believe that there is no alternative to losing money in the postal service are pointedly refuted by available evidence. In saying that private competitors will concern themselves only with selected fields, these competitors show that they are unaware of what can be done with the assistance of imagination and modern technology.

The restrictions on private companies now in operation are severe, but these companies have overcome the limitations and are able to present a better record than that of the Post Office Department. This can be elucidated by referring to certain key elements desired in postal service. Rates are cheaper with privately-held companies than with the Post Office Department. The record of efficiency is much better with the new companies, and improvements can be expected with experience. Conversion of capital to adjust with the times is a built-in factor with capitalistic enterprises, not with the Government. Service is much better than with the Post Office Department. For example, the day a parcel will be delivered to the addressee is guaranteed, delivery to an occupied home is guaranteed, and service need not be confined to certain hours.

These factors are grounds enough to justify the permission of private companies to compete in mail service but if doubt still lingers, one need only look to the cost factor of both systems. Legislation is presently pending which would authorize the Postmaster General to sell $10 billion worth of stock to the Treasury, and this would, in turn, be paid for by congressional appropriations. This is questionable business procedure when you consider that the organization has been in the black only 17 times since 1789 and lost $10 billion since 1960, and further, we have no assurance that this approach will work. To the contrary, it was illustrated in a speech yesterday, March 24, how the new reforms were actually resulting in increased cost and decreased efficiency, but supposing such appropriations do bring the Post Office Departemnt up to date, there is no way that it can continue to keep in step with this fast age without requiring more appropriations in the future. Private enterprise, however, must remain aware of new demands and adjust its services accordingly. They have the added advantage that they pay taxes. It is conceivable that the taxes raised from these companies would at some point match the drain on the Federal budget caused by our sponsorship of the Post Office Department.

Mr. Speaker, it has been my purpose to submit a summary statement of the origins of the postal monopoly, to explore the reasons for its existence and analyze them in light of contemporary evidence to see if they continue to be valid. It is not my purpose to discredit the Kappel report, postal employees or my colleagues who have introduced legislation on this subject. It is clear that the reasons for the monopoly no longer exist and that the time has now come to where we can turn to private enterprise for a solution to a problem Congress inherited nearly two centuries ago. By taking this action, we will be insuring ourselves of postal service that will adjust with the times. We will have a self-supporting system that yields taxes to our Treasury. We will be offering improved services to the public and this is long overdue. These proposals are not revolutionary, for they could be modeled after our Federal Reserve banks.

Few functions of the Federal Government could be more vital to the security of our Nation than control over the dollar, and we have entrusted this to private enterprise which operates under strict Government control. There is no reason why we cannot entrust our postal service to private enterprise which can operate under the guidance of Federal regulations. Such a move should be a consummation devoutly to be wished by all, for at a time when increased demands are being made upon our revenue and administrative ability, we now have the opportunity, the duty, to pursue a legislative course of action that would free Congress from the albatross around its neck.

POSTAL PAY EQUALIZATION ACT

(Mr. AYRES asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill, printed below these remarks to make our postal pay system responsive to differences in cost of living, and differences in the wage structure, in various metropolitan areas and broad geographical sections of the Nation.

The Postal Pay Equalization Act I am introducing would direct the U.S. Civil Service Commission to establish area and regional wage boards, and a national review board, to carry out this policy. The act would apply to all but the top positions in the postal service—those above level 14 in the postal field service schedule—and to all of the rural carrier positions. It would permit increases up to 50 percent of the amounts set forth in the schedules, based upon impartial findings as to cost of living and private enterprise pay for comparable work.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that a system such as I am proposing is fair and equitable, that it would put an end to most of the legitimate wage complaints of the loyal men and women who make up our postal service, and that it would prevent the Nation's postal service from staggering from one crisis to another in its relationships with its employees.

Mr. Speaker, this bill could be on the President's desk within days if the Congress would act, and I am convinced that it would do much to alleviate present difficulties, as well as to head off similar difficulties in the future.

A recent column of Evans and Novak, dealing with the postal problem, is included below as a part of my remarks.

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 25, 1970]

UNION INTRANSIGENCE ON REFORM LAID GROUNDWORK FOR MAIL CRISIS

(By Rowland Evans and Robert Novak)

Although Democratic politicians are having a field day blaming the postal crisis on President Nixon's intransigence, the groundwork for disaster was laid over the past three years by the stubborn opposition of postal union leaders to long-overdue reform.

Ever since President Johnson's postmaster general, Lawrence F. O'Brien, began pushing basic postal reform in 1967, the union bosses have stubbornly resisted not only reform but even gentle compromise out of fear it might undermine their power. Their adamant opposition was renewed when President Nixon's Postmaster General, Winton F. Blount, backed reform with an iron tenacity refusing to surrender to implacable union opposition.

The fact, admitted privately by realistic congressional Democrats, is that there would be no postal crisis today—and postal employees would have a more nearly decent living wage—had the unions not refused to consider reform. Whatever mistakes the Congress and Mr. Nixon have made the past six months could not have occurred but for that refusal.

The reason for this shortsighted opposition is found in the unique nature of the unions. Because Congress itself determines postal pay, postal unions do not engage in collective bargaining but in Capitol Hill lobbying. Their chiefs are not really labor leaders but high-priced Washington operatives, dispensing campaign contributions around Capitol Hill.

O'Brien's proposal for an independent postal corporation would have ended all this, establishing wage procedures ending in compulsory arbitration. Afraid of the unknown, the postal union leaders reflexively opposed reform—with the backing of AFL–CIO President George Meany.

As the Nixon administration took office in 1969, coincidental developments contributed to a turmoil in postal politics. The two major unions, the Letter Carriers and the Clerks, had new leadership and their once warm relationship grew frigid. There was feuding inside the Clerks, with the new president and legislative director in conflict. The Senate Post Office Committee had a brand new chairman, Sen. Gale McGee of Wyoming.

Most important was the nature of the new postmaster general. Unlike O'Brien, Blount was no politician willing to bend but a stiff-backed millionaire Alabama businessman appalled by inefficiency he found in the Post Office Department.

It was Blount's vigorous recommendation last autumn that led to President Nixon's warning that the 11 per cent postal pay rise passed by the House would be vetoed.

Blount's implicit offer: pass reform and you'll get your pay increase. Faced with this hard-boiled ultimatum, President William Rademacher of the Letter Carriers broke the solid union facade against reform.

A compromise pay-reform bill worked out by Rademacher, Blount, and Rep. Morris Udall of Arizona (foremost Democratic advocate of reform) finally cleared the House Post Office Committee on Feb. 12—to the amazed chagrin of its chairman, Rep. Thaddeus Dulski of New York, mouthpiece of the postal unions. Although the bill called for only a 5.4 per cent pay increase, it contained a provision—quietly agreed to by the White House—virtually guaranteeing a much bigger boost effective July 1.

But like so many union chieftains today, Rademacher had lost his rank-and-file. Just as they were about to get their delayed pay increase, the letter carriers revolted in wildcat strikes and the crisis was born.

It is a crisis for Rademacher as well as President Nixon and the U.S. Officials of other postal unions, having maintained their opposition to reform, bitterly resent Rademacher. They communicate with him only in formal communications (addressed "Dear Mr. Rademacher"). They can take pride in having maintained the proper degree of militancy.

Indeed, with the pressure now on the President, Congress and Rademacher, the other union leaders are off the hook with their past record obscured. Lost in the shuffle, for example, is the fact that postal union leaders have long and unwisely opposed geographical distinction in pay—a major grievance of hard-pressed New York City workers who began the walkout.

The result is impasse. With an atmosphere of lawlessness pervading the country, there is strong sentiment in both the White House and Congress against capitulation to the postal workers, inviting illegal strikes by municipal workers nationwide. All this could have been prevented had the unions accepted postal reform, but that simple truth is lost in the chaos.

H.R. 16684

A bill to authorize the United States Civil Service Commission to adjust levels of compensation in the postal field service to reflect regional and area differentials in the cost of living and in pay for comparable jobs in private industry, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Postal Pay Equalization Act of 1970".

SEC. 2. Chapter 45 of title 39, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"§ 3590. Policy

"(a) It is the policy of the Congress that rates of pay for employees within the purview of this Chapter be based on the principles—

"(1) that compensation for the postal field service (including rural carriers) is to be governed basically by the schedules set forth in this Chapter and in no instance be less than amounts therein provided;

"(2) that such compensation nevertheless should be adjusted annually, on a regional and/or area basis, so as to reflect regional or area differentials in cost of living and to be made comparable with private enterprise rates of pay for work of the same type or level of difficulty.

"(b) Rates of pay shall be adjusted annually, in accordance with the policy set forth in subsection (a) of this section and the procedures prescribed in section 3591 of this title.

"§ 3591. Duties of the Civil Service Commission; establishment of postal wage boards

"(a) The United States Civil Service Commission is authorized and directed to establish, in such manner as the Commission may deem best calculated to carry out the purposes of section 3590 of this title, a national postal wage review board, and such regional and area postal wage boards as may be necessary, to carry out the purposes of this section.

"(b) It shall be the duty of the area or regional postal wage boards to review at least annually the factors bearing upon the wages of postal workers in such area or region and to recommend to the national postal wage review board such adjustments (within the limitations herein specified) as may be needed to assure:

"(1) that such wages reflect significant changes in the cost of living within such area over the preceding twelve months; and

"(2) that such wages are comparable to those paid by private enterprise in such area for comparable types of work.

"(c) It shall be the duty of the national postal wage review board to review the recommendations of area boards, to make such adjustments as may be necessary to reflect differences in cost of living between areas and regions of the Nation or to conform to the findings of its review, and to certify the resulting figures to the Chairman of the United States Civil Service Commission.

"(d) The Chairman of the United States Civil Service Commission, upon receipt of the certifications pursuant to subsection (c), shall notify the Postmaster General of the changes to be made in wage structures within particular areas or regions and such changes shall become effective within thirty days of such notification.

"§ 3592. Limitations

"(a) The provisions of sections 3590 and 3591 shall apply to the Rural Carrier Schedule and to the first fourteen salary levels in the Postal Field Service Schedule, but shall not apply to level 15 or higher levels in such schedule.

"(b) No recommendation or finding of a wage board established pursuant to this Chapter shall act to lower any rate of compensation established pursuant to the schedules set forth herein, nor shall such recommendations or findings result in an increase in such rate or rates of compensation by more than fifty percentum of the amount set forth in such schedules.

"(c) Changes in levels of compensation made pursuant to sections 3590 and 3591 shall not result in positions in any salary level in the Postal Field Service Schedule being compensated at a level above that of a higher position in the area or region affected by such changes.

"§ 3593. Definitions

As used in sections 3590, 3591, and 3592—

"(a) The term 'region' shall mean a broad geographical region of the United States or such other area within the coverage of this title as the Civil Service Commission deems best calculated for the purposes of these sections.

"(b) The term 'area' shall mean a standard statistical metropolitan area as utilized by the Bureau of the Census, except as the Civil Service Commission may determine such area to be inappropriate for the purposes of these sections.

COMMERCIALIZATION OF OUR AGED, PART II, THE NURSING HOME PATIENT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR) is recognized for 60 minutes.

(Mr. PRYOR of Arkansas asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. PRYOR of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous matter on the subject of the special order I am presenting at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRYOR or Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, when I addressed the House 1 month ago on the subject of nursing homes and homes for the aged, I referred to the disastrous fire in Marietta, Ohio, which took the lives of 32 of the 46 patients of the Harmar House Nursing Home. I return to the subject of this fire today, not to belabor this particular nursing home or this tragedy any further, but to comment on some of the lessons it teaches us about standards in Federal programs for nursing home care and the performance of these programs in protecting patients and the public.

Shortly before 10 p.m. on January 9, 1970, the heat sensor in room 104 of Harmar House registered 136 degrees and signaled the nurses' station. The nurse's aide pulled the aged occupant of the room to safety, but dense, acrid smoke billowed through the home and when the toll was finally counted, 32 people were dead. Harmar House was a modern building of fire resistive construction. We are told by State and local officials that the home had no building code violations. There was little structural damage to the building. The patients died of smoke inhalation. The smoke was produced mainly by the foam rubber backing of the nylon pile carpeting as it burned in the rooms and down a long undivided corridor.

Mr. Speaker, Harmar House was certified as an extended care facility for participation in Medicare. Some of the patients were beneficiaries of this Federal program. Section 1861 (j) of the Social Security Act provides in part that an extended care facility shall meet "conditions relating to the health and safety of individuals—as the Secretary may find necessary." The Congress stated the charge clearly. The public and the beneficiaries of the program should be able to look to the regulations of the Secretary for protection of health and safety. But, sad to say, such is not the case. Let us examine these regulations.

Mr. Speaker, these regulations, known as the conditions of participation, were drawn up on 1966 and made effective with the start of the extended care benefit in Medicare on January 1, 1967. At that time the Federal Government—specifically the Public Health Service of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare—had adopted and made mandatory a specific standard, based on a widely recognized test procedure, for the flame spread rating of carpeting and other interior finishes in hospitals and nursing homes finished through the Hill-Burton program. Despite the years of experience and the expertise in the field of structural and fire-safety standards developed by the Hill-Burton program, the Bureau of Health Insurance of the Social Security Administration—also a part of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare—did not utilize it as they wrote the conditions of participation relating to fire safety for extended care facilities. In my speech in this chamber on February 24, I spoke of fragmentation of responsibility and noncommunication among Government agencies administering programs involving nursing homes. Here is a clear example.

Hill-Burton standards require fire and smoke barriers at specifically stated intervals to help contain and localize fire and smoke damage. At Harmar House, which met the Social Security Administration's standards, the burning of the carpet backing and the propogation of deadly smoke spread unimpeded in a 244-foot undivided corridor. It seems almost incredible, Mr. Speaker, that two programs in the same Federal department do not have comparable safety standards for the same facilities.

Instead the Social Security Administration went its own way and issued standards for fire safety which are not really standards at all. They rely almost wholly on State and local codes, on vague phrases, and on the discretion of nameless inspectors. I would like to illustrate the dangerous permissiveness of the fire-safety provisions in Medicare:

In section 405.1134, "Condition of Participation—Physical Environment," we find the following:

(a) Standard; Safety of Patients. The extended care facility is constructed, equipped, and maintained to insure the safety of patients. It is structurally sound and satisfies the following conditions: (1) The facility complies with all applicable state and local codes governing construction. (2) Fire resistance and flame spread ratings of construction, materials, and finishes comply with current State and local fire protection codes and ordinances. (3) Permanently attached automatic fire extinguishing systems of adequate capacity are installed in all areas considered to have special fire hazards including but not limited to boiler rooms, trash rooms, and nonfire resistant areas or buildings. (4) Doorways, passageways, and stairwells are well enough for easy evacuation of patients and are kept free from obstruction at all times. (5) Unless the facility is of fire resistive construction, blind and nonambulatory or physically handicapped persons are not housed above the street level floor. (6) Reports of periodic inspections of the structure by the fire control authority having jurisdiction in the area are on file in the facility. (7) The building is maintained in good repair and kept free of hazards such as those created by any damaged or defective parts of the building. (8) No occupancies or activities undesirable to the health and safety of patients are located in the building or buildings of the extended care facility.

These, Mr. Speaker, are almost all of the provisions of the medicare fire safety standards. I call attention particularly to the terms which allow and invite wide discretion on the part of State or local inspectors, who may or may not be technically qualified to make the judgments; terms like "wide enough for easy evacuation." But even these provisions are undermined by the preamble to this section of the regulations which reads as follows:

The following standards are guidelines to help State agencies to evaluate existing structures which do not meet Hill-Burton construction regulations in effect at the time of the survey, and to evaluate in all facilities those aspects of the physical environment which are not covered by Hill-Burton regulations. They are to be applied to existing construction with discretion and in light of community need for service.

The inspector now is armed with vague and subjective standards which he is instructed to apply "with discretion."

Mr. Speaker, in a letter to the Washington editor of Hospital Practice magazine, replying to a question about the vagueness and permissiveness of medicare fire safety standards, the Director of the Bureau of Health Insurance made the following statement:

The phraseology used in the regs in no way limits the scope of a surveyor's inquiry or his authority to insist on corrective measures, and a Medicare surveyor is therefore empowered to insist on Class A carpeting or any other change he feels is essential to patient safety.

With all respect to this worthy Federal official, I say that statement is nonsense. It is ridiculous. It is another example of passing the buck, of shifting the onus of hard decisionmaking to someone else. Moreover, it is not true. If an inspector sought to insist on class A carpeting and disapprove a nursing home for participation on this basis when the regulations speak only of a requirement for complying with State and local codes, he certainly would be found to be arbitrary and capricious by a court if not by his own administrative superiors. However, leaving the legality of this statement aside for the moment, let us look at the practicality of it.

In many States, the actual inspections for medicare certification are made not by State agencies but by surveyors from local agencies. In the case of Harmar House in Marietta, Ohio, the actual inspections for medicare were made by a nurse employed by the county health department. I ask each of my colleagues now to try to imagine himself in the position of this county health department nurse as she goes out to inspect Harmar House. One of the principal owners of Harmar House is the county coroner. The coroner's wife is the city health officer of Marietta. The other owners of the home include some of the most prominent physicians and businessmen in the community. And we, the great Federal Government, are saying to this county employee: "We are not going to give you a standard to apply. It is up to you. Now, go out there and get tough with them."

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am not alleging that the inspector of Harmar House was intimidated or that the owners of the home acted in any improper way. On the other hand, I do say that if Federal programs are to rely in the last analysis on the local inspector for the application of Federal regulations, we must consider some of the realities of the daily life of these people who are on the firing line. I do not know if our present method of relying on local surveyors and State review processes is the best way to apply Federal program requirements to nursing homes. I think this subject should be carefully studied and alternative methods evaluated. I believe the Select Committee on Nursing Homes and Homes for the Aged which I have proposed should undertake this as one of many much-needed studies. But as long as we do administer standards for nursing homes who sell services to Federal programs according to the present pattern, the Federal administrators owe it to the surveyor in the field and owe it to the patients and their families to equip the surveyors with standards which can and will be uniformly and objectively applied. As Mr. W. H. Veigel of the Ohio health department put to a reporter for Hospital Practice magazine:

As a person reviewing surveys, I think it is time Medicare people showed some intestinal fortitude by letting operators of nursing homes know what's important.

Mr. Speaker, one would think that the lessons of the Harmar House tragedy might have brought out some of this intestinal fortitude. Carpeting is widely used in nursing homes today, especially in the newer facilities we find participating in medicare. What could be more obvious that the omission in the medicare regulations of any standard for floor covering should be promptly corrected? What, in fact, has happened since January 9, 1970? Let us take a look.

On January 19, 10 days after the fire, the Public Health Service sent a memorandum to State agencies stating that:

No carpet or carpet assembly (carpet plus pad) presently installed or proposed for installation should have a flame spread rating of more than 75.

This is the Hill-Burton standard. Mr. Speaker, there is a great difference in the two words "should" and "shall." The medicare standards refer only to State and local codes which, in the case of this Ohio home, permitted carpet which registered 275 when tested by Underwriters Laboratories. However, the Public Health Service was handing out mere advice, not regulation. The Bureau of Health Insurance must act to protect medicare patients from the hazards of unsafe floor covering.

Another month went by before the Bureau of Health Insurance, whose officials by then were facing a hearing before the subcommittee headed by the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. FOUNTAIN), decided to send a letter to State agencies advising them that at some unspecified future date a regulation would be issued incorporating the Public Health Service advice—partially incorporating the Hill-Burton standard for flame spread ratings of interior finishes which has been in effect since before the medicare program began. In the meantime, State agencies were asked to send letters to nursing homes inquiring whether they had carpet and if so, the flame spread rating. Where unsafe carpeting is found, the nursing home is to be asked to "explain the steps it will take to correct the deficiency or alternative steps to protect the environment from fire hazard." This process will take even more months. Will yet another Marietta occur while a cumbersome, slow, unresponsive, duplicating, bureaucratic system awaits the "explanation" of why unsafe carpeting is permitted in our Nation's nursing homes and homes for the aged?

Why wait? Why temporize with this issue of safety? The Hill-Burton standard has been in effect for years. Similar standards for floor coverings are found in the model code of the National Fire Protection Association and many State Codes. The carpet industry is accustomed to these standards and every major carpet manufacturer can supply carpet which meets them. For nursing homes to remove and replace unsafe carpeting creates inconvenience and expense; but, the alternative is to allow medicare beneficiaries who may be aged and helpless to be confined in the presence of a known hazard to life while, no doubt, thinking that their Government has acted to assure their health and safety. Obviously, this alternative is unacceptable. Eventually, these standards must be issued. Why not now? If the Bureau of Health Insurance cannot act now when the terrible deaths of 32 helpless people are fresh in our minds, when will it act?

Mr. Speaker, I have focused my remarks today on the subject of fire safety standards and on some specialized and technical aspects of that subject. I have done so not just to crusade for safe carpet, but because the performance of the administrators of medicare on this issue may tell us something about the more general problem of assuring that beneficiaries of Federal programs in nursing homes are protected. In my earlier speech I spoke of the patient taking a back seat to a rather thirsty quest for profits on the part of nursing home operators. The nursing home patient may be occupying another back seat, too; a back seat to the convenience and the comfort of bureaucrats. I am sure that officials of the Bureau of Health Insurance who are responsible for that agency's milling about in the field of standard setting, ritually avow, like medical care administrators everywhere, their unflagging devotion to "the patient." But this patient is an abstraction.

They do not see him in the offices and corridors of the Social Security Administration. They do see other bureaucrats, representatives of providers and other interest groups. Administrative and policymaking routines are established in which these are the participants. The patient, although often mentioned, is not there. He again is voiceless—helpless against a vast, complex and mysteriously bureaucratic system which protects the system—not the patient. The patient, who is in reality a living, feeling human being, takes a back seat to the working of that system, to the difficulty of making a decision, to the defense of past decisions, to the reluctance to take a firm stand in the presence of criticism or opposition, to the fear of rocking the boat.

Mr. Speaker, I recently received a copy of a resolution adopted by the Board of Directors of the National Consumer League. I was very interested to see that the National Consumer League combined in one expression of policy its concern over the passive policies and vacillation of the Social Security Administration in the matter of medicare safety standards and its support for my resolution calling for the creation of a Select Committee on Nursing Homes and Homes for the Aged in the House of Representatives. This in part led me to look more deeply into the Harmer House experience and to prepare these remarks. I join the League in urging prompt and forthright action on the part of the Social Security Administration to give meaning to the safety standards for medicare nursing homes. I welcome the League's support of my resolution and I hope that the Select Committee can address itself to the difficult problems involved in making Federal programs involving nursing home care more sensitive and more responsive to the protection and vital needs of the hundreds of thousands of citizens we seek to serve.

Mr. Speaker, I include the resolution of the National Consumer League and an article from the March issue of Hospital Practice magazine entitled "Fire Disaster in Ohio Home: How Good Are Safety Codes?" at this point.

MARCH 18, 1970.

Hon. DAVID PRYOR,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN PRYOR: The League commends you for introducing House Resolution 850.

Enclosed are copies of the Resolution adopted by the League Board on March 10, and the letter of transmittal to Speaker McCormack. We have also written to Secretary Finch and Commissioner Ball on this subject.

Sincerely yours,

SARAH H. NEWMAN,
General Secretary.

RESOLUTION OF NATIONAL CONSUMERS LEAGUE ON SOCIAL SECURITY ADMINISTRATION, EXTENDED CARE FACILITIES, AND SAFETY, AND HOUSE RESOLUTION 850

The National Consumers League finds that Medicare regulations covering the safety of patients in extended care facilities are faulty. They are highly permissive and rely on state and local codes, which often are weak. The Medicare regulations should form a basic, clear national standard guaranteeing safety to those weak and feeble patients.

The League urges the Social Security Administration to overhaul the Conditions of Participation for Extended Care Facilities to embody a strict safety code, with particular emphasis on flame resistance of such interior finishing materials as carpets.

The League recognizes that nothing in the Medicare conditions limited the installation of the type of carpeting which burned at the Marietta, Ohio nursing home in January. The carpet produced dense, toxic smoke that killed 32 of the 46 patients.

The League finds that the Social Security Administration has temporized with the safety of the aged by not taking the essential step of requiring nursing homes to remove this type of carpeting at once. The League urges SSA to do this immediately. And states and localities are also urged to tighten their codes.

Because nursing home patients often are subjected to disgraceful and scandalous treatment, the League endorses House Resolution 850, submitted by Rep. David Pryor of Arkansas. This resolution would set up a nine-member select committee on nursing homes and homes for the aged. It would have investigative but not legislative authority. We urge Congress to take up this resolution at the soonest moment possible and to approve establishment of this committee.

FIRE DISASTER IN OHIO HOME: HOW GOOD ARE SAFETY CODES?

Sometime after 9:30 PM, January 9, fire broke out in room 104 of the Harmar House Convalescent Home in Marietta, Ohio. In less than an hour, the fire was over. But the thick clouds of smoke, leaving an acrid smell behind, were not to be forgotten easily. Twenty-one of the 46 patients, most of them in their late 70's or 80's, had died almost at once. Soon another 11 were to die. Cause of death: asphyxiation from smoke inhalation. Not one had burned flesh.

Gov. James A. Rhodes described the proprietary home, owned by businessmen and several physicians (among them the county coroner) as a "first class institution." Ohio Fire Marshal Samuel T. Sides called it a "modern fire-resistant structure with no building code violations." W. H. Veigel of the Ohio department of health said it was "one of the finest and safest homes in the U.S."

What then explained the loss of 32 lives?

A good part of the answer lies in the carpeting. Fire Marshal Sides said the toxic smoke came principally from the bonded foam-rubber backing under the 100% nylon tufting. Harmer House had carpet in all patient rooms and corridors, including a 244-foot north-south corridor. It was a carpet assembly of a type that could be bought in any store.

But carpeting was not all, a Hospital Practice Study finds. Fire safety is the result of attention to large and small details in construction and operation of a health facility. The Marietta fire illustrates failures of significance to physicians and others who work in or have responsibility for patients in these facilities. It is also of significance to physicians and others as consumers. They may be loading their homes and offices with products that increase fire hazards without being aware that they are doing so.

The Marietta fire also demonstrated a breakdown in fire evacuation procedures. Perhaps most important of all, it showed that Medicare and state codes may not protect patients effectively. In Ohio, they did not.

THE FIRE

Exactly when fire broke out in room 104 is not known. Nor how. It may have begun when the elderly occupant or an employee dropped a lit cigarette or emptied an ashtray into a plastic wastebasket, Marietta Fire Chief Beman Biehl told a U.S. Senate committee under Frank Moss (D-Utah) last month. Fire spread from the basket to a wooden nightstand and a plastic-covered chair as well as to the carpet. A heat sensor in the room signaled trouble when the temperature hit 136° F. From the nurses' station at the center of the cross-shaped building came in an aide and a practical nurse, two of the home's four employees on that shift. (Two private-duty nurses also were in the home.) The practical nurse turned away at the sight of dense smoke spewing from 104. The aide, 19-year-old Doris Watts, made it into the room. Although she weighs only 87 lb, she managed to pull the patient from bed and up the corridor. She left the door open. Intending to get a fire extinguisher and return to 104, she found the smoke gushing down the corridor intolerable. She and other employees began moving patients outside. Somebody left the corridor door open.

Chief Biehl estimates at least a four-minute delay in the staff's telephoning the fire department. Firemen arrived within five minutes. They had the fire out in 12. Marietta Mayor John A. Burnworth says hair was unsinged on many bodies.

Harmar House was required, as a Medicare extended care facility, to have a disaster plan. From the time it entered Medicare in 1967 until early 1969, it had deficiencies in its plan. Health department surveyors working for Medicare listed deficiencies in specification of alarm signals, frequency of fire drills, and assignment of personnel responsibility in a crisis. In April 1969, the Washington County health department nurse surveying the facility reported the deficiencies were remedied, according to Social Security Administration files in Baltimore. However SSA did not know how the deficiencies were remedied or if the changes were really in effect. An official said SSA relied on the local health department's word.

According to Chief Biehl, the home's staff was unfamiliar with the sound of the fire alarm. He said that Miss Watts had been on the job for a few months but had had no fire evacuation instruction. Mayor Burnworth quoted her as saying she thought the heat sensor automatically signaled the fire department. But there was no direct line, and there was no state or local requirement for this. Nor one in Medicare. The home's last drill, Chief Biehl said, was in April 1969, but he did not know how thorough it had been.

Cardinal to any fire disaster plan is closing room doors to confine fire. This is as important as sounding the alarm and calling the firemen, authorities agree unanimously. Chief Biehl was asked by Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Texas) if he thought there was negligence on the part of a Harmar House employee. The chief said he didn't know whether it should be called negligence or human error. He said Miss Watts knew she did not shut the door and that this was wrong. But, he pointed out later, she was a small woman struggling to get a feeble patient up the hall.

Mayor Burnworth told Hospital Practice the doorway to 104 was too narrow to let pass a hospital bed. He said the beds had to be assembled in the room. Chief Biehl was not sure about the width. But whatever it was, it was not in violation of state or Medicare regulations. As in many other things, Medicare leaves widths of doorways, corridors, and aisles to the discretion of the surveyor by saying they should be "wide enough for easy evacuation."

Fire officials reported no fire doors in the 244-foot north-south corridor. And none was required by the state. Nor Medicare. Hill-Burton and the Life Safety Code of the National Fire Protection Association call for at least one division every 150 feet of corridor. Fire doors block fire and smoke and impede drafts that fan fires. The state building code covering small nursing homes has been criticized for years for not requiring compartmentalization. However, the agency that sets building codes has no fire safety expert on its policy board. Medicare, though a national program, relies on state and local codes. According to James P. Regan, the former chief of fire prevention for New York City's fire department and a consultant to the American Nursing Home Association, the lack of compartmentalization in corridors and a loft at Harmar House contributed to the loss of life.

The home had no sprinklers. Expert opinion is divided on their value. Chief Biehl believes that automatic sprinklers would have saved lives at the home. (Indeed, a fire in a patient's room at another Ohio nursing home in February was put out by a sprinkler after the nurse had removed the patient and closed the door.) Richard Stevens, technical secretary of the National Fire Protection Association, says that automatic devices in one combination or another—such as sprinklers, heat sensors, and smoke detectors—are essential in health facilities. They should be linked by telegraph line to fire departments to allow automatic reporting. Patients themselves are fire hazards, and where staff turnover does not permit a high degree of discipline, the need is for as much automaticity in fire protection as possible, he told the committee.

Regulations that leave discretion in fire evacuation procedure, construction, and finishing materials in the hands of local persons are not likely to protect patients, said Mayor Burnworth, implying that pressure groups have kept Ohio's fire code affecting nursing homes in poor shape. "One responsibility the federal government has is to do things for us we can't do for ourselves. I'm not against federal intervention if it's for the benefit of the patient," he told the committee. This echoed a comment by Mr. Veigel of the health department in a telephone interview. "As a person reviewing surveys, I think it is time Medicare people showed some intestinal fortitude by letting operators of nursing homes know what's important," he said. He termed Medicare and the Ohio code "weak."

CARPETING

The Moss committee was shown slides of smoke damage at Harmar House. Even white tile was shown blackened from the dense smoke. There was little structural damage, however. The smoke was attributed to the foam-rubber backing on the carpet, made by Dan River Mills, Inc., and marketed in 1965 under the name "Marathon." There was nothing illegal under the Ohio code in using it. Nor under Medicare. The Ohio code allows carpeting that has a flame-spread rating of up to 500 when tested by the so-called tunnel test. By reference, Medicare incorporates this standard in Ohio. "Marathon" had a flame-spread of 275, according to Underwriters Laboratory, Chicago.

This is almost four times the maximum flamespread rating regarded as safe under the Hill-Burton construction standards for hospitals and nursing homes built with government grants. The National Fire Protection Association's Life Safety Code recommends that interior finishes, such as carpeting, have no more than a 75 rating, the same as Hill-Burton, for patients' rooms. (In corridors, Hill-Burton recommends no more than 25 but will allow up to 75 per carpet if other materials in walls, ceilings, and structure are below 25.)

By virtue of a law Sen. Moss championed in 1967, the Life Safety Code became effective in Ohio Medicaid nursing homes on January 1, 1970. The code, which has many waiver provisions on existing construction but is tougher on new construction, covers carpeting. It allows local authorities to permit more than a 75 flamespread rating if convinced no hazard arises to patients. A forthcoming revision will remove the waiver from the code but not the law, which is pegged to the current edition of the code. Harmar House was eligible to receive Medicaid patients but had none at the time of the fire. As the code now exists, Harmar House might have been approved on waivers, but the picture is not clear. However, under the Moss provision, a surveyor would have to give reasons for waivers and state alternative means of safeguarding patients, giving a time limit for compliance.

Ohio officials are not clear about whether they must apply the Life Safety Code to homes that are in Medicare but not in Medicaid. Under the Medicare law, the Social Security Administration could require Ohio to apply this code if SSA recognized the code as superior to current Medicare requirements. But up to the time of the Marietta disaster, SSA had made no move to make a finding—even though Medicaid's use of the code had been scheduled by Congress almost two years ago.

On January 16, seven days after the fire, the Public Health Service circulated a memorandum to state agencies, advising against the use of carpet and carpet assemblies with ratings of more than 75. The memo said major manufacturers could supply safe carpeting if asked. Since 1965, when the Hill-Burton branch of PHS began calling for carpet meeting this standard, industry had begun in earnest to test for flammability. The knowledge about standards and testing was available in 1966 when Medicare ECF regulations were drawn up. Nonetheless, the regulations contain no specific reference to them.

In 1967, on another front, Sen. Moss helped amend the Flammable Fabrics Act to cover carpeting. But only last December did the Department of Commerce propose a test to establish flammability status. The test employs a methenamine pill as an ignition source. It is dropped on a square of carpet held in a frame. The extent of burning in a defined interval is measured. A piece of carpet from Harmar House was subjected to the "pill test." It passed. Sen. Moss later termed the proposed test "inadequate" and asked Commerce to replace it with the more severe tunnel test used by Hill-Burton.

At the hearings, Sens. Moss and Harrison Williams Jr. (D-N.J.) participated in a demonstration. They held a specimen of Harmar House carpet while Mayor Burnworth ignited it to show the smoke production. "Smells like a rubber tire," he said, dropping the piece into a galvanized trash can and putting on the lid to spare the packed hearing room more of the acrid smell. The ubiquity of such carpeting was demonstrated by Chief Biehl. He reported that "Marathon" was in Marietta Memorial Hospital and Selby General Hospital. It was in the Marietta schools, too. He found similar carpeting in the anteroom of the New Senate Office Building, and a piece burned as smokily as "Marathon." Fire Marshal Sides said he had similar carpeting in his office.

Dan River Mills representatives told the committee that "Marathon" was not hazardous in any respect "from the standpoint of any known flammability in 1965, when it was in production. In 1968, the carpet industry made 71 million square yards of carpeting with foam-rubber backing, or 12% of all carpet production. In 1969 the figure went up 10%. Dan River said it believed the "pill test" simulates the most realistic household hazard, dropping of a match or cigarette. However, an expert on such testing, Calvin Yuill of the Southwest Research Institute, San Antonio, has told Commerce that the pill test does not really simulate actual hazard conditions and that any representations of safety based on it could create "an unjustified security in the mind of the consumer."

Much of the carpeting and foam-rubber underlays produced in this country exceed the rating Hill-Burton finds acceptable. This seems clear. But there is considerable dispute between industry and health officials over what test is acceptable for general purposes. It also seems clear that flammability testing is in its infancy and there is a need to measure the toxicity of fumes from mixtures of burning plastics from furniture, carpets, wall and ceiling materials.

STANDARD SETTING

Testifying for the American Patients Association, Theodore O. Cron, its president and a former HEW official, declared that the Medicare regulations "can hardly be called 'standards,' they are so nonspecific. For example, corridors in Medicare-supported homes need only be 'wide enough for easy evacuation.' Yet, the Hill-Burton standard and the Life Safety Code have real specifications—eight feet as the minimum corridor width.

The Ohio Nursing Home Association told Sen. Moss it endorsed the application of the Life Safety Code.

In opening the hearing, Sen. Moss noted that Medicare's section on fire safety contains a disclaimer unique in the ECF regulations. He said it was a double disclaimer: While seeming to insist that an ECF be built and maintained "to insure the safety of patients," the regulations declare (1) that "the following standards are guidelines," and (2) that they be applied "with discretion in the light of community need for service."

In addition, ECF's are acceptable to Medicare if a surveyor finds them in "substantial," not complete, compliance. This concept has been attacked by a staff report of the Senate Finance Committee. It urged eliminating it. The report hinted at a possible reason for substantial compliance, which has been criticized as lacking solid objective criteria for judgment. In a section entitled, "Wholesale Certification of Facilities," the report referred to an attempt to certify as many nursing homes as possible in 1966 and 1967. As of July 1969, it noted further, 1,374 ECF's were in full compliance but 3,402 were in "substantial" compliance.

Several fire safety experts were asked by Hospital Practice to review the Medicare regulations on fire safety, section 405.1134 of the "Conditions of Participation." Mr. Stevens of the National Fire Protection Association said they lacked the nitty-gritty exactness of true standards. It's like asking everybody to "drive safely" rather than setting limits, Mr. Stevens said. Mr. Regan, the fire safety consultant was succinct: "They stink!"

The director of SSA's Bureau of Health Insurance, Thomas M. Tierney, objected to the conclusion that Medicare regulations pack no punch because they are couched in general terms, whereas the Life Safety Code is very specific. "It is not true that standards couched in general terms are lower than standards which spell out a series of specific requirements," he wrote this journal.

Sen. Moss says that if the PHS or SSA needs more legislative authority to get tight fire safety into Medicare, "I will introduce legislation forthwith." He intends to have the Life Safety Code incorporated in Medicare—with no disclaimers. He is considering a bill to ban smoking in hospitals and nursing homes, except in designated areas away from immobilized patients.

Spurred by the interest in fire safety after Harmar House, SSA is expediting revisions of its regulations in consultation with PHS. Commerce says it is working on tests in addition to the pill test, to establish the safety of carpet in general use.

One may hope with Sen. Moss that his hearing indicates society's "refusal to accept disaster as inevitable." The resolve sounds fine, but it remains to be seen how long it will take government to make good on it.

Mr. HECHLER of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRYOR of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HECHLER of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the gentleman from Arkansas for the imaginative and conscientious work which he has done in bringing to the attention of the Congress and the country the problems in the nursing homes of our Nation, and what needs to be done in order to correct these problems. The disastrous fire at Harmar House in Marietta, Ohio, which the gentleman has just been describing took the lives of a number of West Virginians, my own constituents. Many things need to be done to correct not only the situation which led to this fire but conditions generally in nursing homes throughout this Nation. I am very pleased that the gentleman from Arkansas has taken the lead on this issue, and I hope the Members of this House and the other body will join him, as I know people throughout the Nation have, in supporting his efforts to correct these conditions.

Mr. PRYOR of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman's remarks and also appreciate his interest in and deep concern for our nursing home patients today and those who are confined to some 23,000 homes for the aged.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRYOR of Arkansas. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY).

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the gentleman from Arkansas for his indepth study and not just an academic study of the problem of bureaucracy in the nursing homes.

The gentleman has given much of his own personal time as a volunteer to help many of our aged people. He has shaved men and played cards with women—these senior citizens who seem to have in many cases outlived their contemporaries and are very lonely, and whose physical disabilities require such institutions that we now know as nursing homes.

When the gentleman speaks of bureaucracy, we know that we have inspection standards on the Federal level, on the State level, on the county level, and on the municipal level, and somehow through the many levels many things get confused.

The cost of nursing homes have increased fourfold in recent years, and probably a part and parcel of this cost increase is this tremendous bureaucracy as it relates to the nursing homes.

The Internal Revenue Service, medicare and medicaid, all perform the same audit at nursing homes so that we have nursing home's bookkeeping departments receive the same audit five and six times at great cost to the nursing home without any improvement in bedside care to our older people.

I think that we also know that the cost-reimbursement-type nursing home, where the Federal Government pays on the basis of the cost of the home, have caused many difficulties.

In my State, particularly, we have nursing homes that I would call sloppily run, very poorly operated nursing homes that have negotiated labor contracts that require for greater wage and benefit costs than their competitive nursing homes, if we can use the term "competitive." And they can, let us say, give away this extra increment of the funding of the home through poor negotiating of their contracts because of the reimbursement type of payment that the homes are based on. In other words there is no incentive to efficiently run a nursing home.

I think the entire nursing home industry needs a look at, and needs a look at from the Federal level. We should have some relationship between the payment to nursing homes and the level of care given to the patient. I do not think, as the gentleman has so adequately pointed out to the entire Nation in February, that we can afford to have faulty inspections such as triggered and were responsible for the tragedy that the gentleman has been talking about. I think we need a tightening and a reevaluation of this bureaucracy as it relates to nursing home care.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the gentleman from Arkansas on taking the lead in this field.

Mr. PRYOR of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I deeply appreciate the remarks of my friend, the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY). He was very eloquent and most enlightening. In fact, the gentleman has mentioned some facts just now that had not come to my attention, and I want the gentleman to know that I appreciate this. I know that many millions of Americans appreciate the interest of the gentleman from New York in this very crucial and vital matter which faces our Nation today.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRYOR of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I commend the gentleman for bringing this important matter to the attention of Members of the Congress and the people of this country. It is so important that certainly some of the situations the gentleman describes should be brought to the attention of the Members. I associate myself with the gentleman in his remarks.

Mr. PRYOR of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I deeply appreciate the remarks of my friend, the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. MONTGOMERY), and thank him for his generous statement. Certainly we welcome his support in this endeavor.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I was moved by the speech of the gentleman from Arkansas, and I want to commend him on his effort in behalf of millions of forgotten Americans. While I cannot speak for the country at large, I can tell the Members there is widespread support in my district for the gentleman's proposal that the Congress create a committee to study the adequacy of nursing homes in this country.

What I have heard today convinces me even more of the need for such a committee and such a study. We are told that the tragic Ohio fire was caused by poor-quality carpeting, yet by the standards applied by the Social Security Administration this carpeting was "safe." It did not meet the safety standards of the Hill-Burton Program, which was also applicable but apparently ignored. In any event, a tragedy occurred, and we will go on wondering whether it could have been avoided if there were better oversight and coordination on the part of Federal agencies.

I notice in the papers that the term "benign neglect" has gained some popularity lately. I suppose this term could apply to the manner in which we Americans treat our old and infirmed. These are the people who exist only in the fringe of our national consciousness, in retirement or nursing homes far removed from the thoroughfares of this society. They are easily ignored, and we are moved to take notice of their existence only when there is a fire or a scandal or, God forbid, when it becomes necessary to place one of our own in such a home.

Mr. Speaker, this is one of the great disgraces of American society. I join with the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR) in calling on Congress to turn its attention to America's aged, and to right what we all know to be an egregious wrong.

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to indicate my complete endorsement of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR) calling for the creation of a House Select Committee on Nursing Homes and Homes for the Aged. Such a proposal has been long overdue and constitutes, I believe, a public service not only to the Nation's older people, but to the nursing home industry as well.

For many years now, we have seen—repeated time and time again—disastrous occurrences which have revealed the hazards which many such homes can represent to the safety and well-being of the people needing nursing home care. Exposés such as that which our distinguished colleague so boldly undertook, demonstrates beyond any doubt that we have indeed made little effort to upgrade the quality of all of our long-term care institutions in America.

Of course, not all nursing homes and homes for the aged in this country fall into the category of death traps or illness-producing institutions. In fact, it is a tribute to most owners and administrators of homes that serious efforts have been made to improve the quality of care which these facilities offer to the American people. But there can be no doubt that laxity, indifference, and greed have also helped to provide a breeding ground for hundreds and perhaps even more facilities whose doors should be nailed shut. It is my sincere belief that a large majority of the American people have lost all confidence in the Nation's nursing home industry. Many older people dread the thought of having to go into institutions which provide care they know little about. Sons and daughters of our senior citizens tremble at the knowledge that they may have to send their older relatives into institutions with a long record of fire disasters, poor care, and little hope of improvement. Even our medical profession seems unable or unwilling to exert its influence to eliminate those homes whose performance hardly justifies the name of "nursing home care."

As I see it, they, the creation of a Select Committee on Nursing Homes in the House can have important direct and sanitary effects on the quality of nursing home care in the United States. First, I would hope that this committee could recommend to the House specific ways in which legislative action might substantially strengthen our surveillance of nursing home care facilities. Also, there may be new ways in which we can assist the States, who now bear the responsibility for such monitoring, to improve their efforts. Or, there may be ways in which through Federal programs we can guarantee the kind of care we believe nursing homes should provide. But the very existence of such a committee can also help us focus on the variety of other problems which plague the country's long-term care portion of the health industry. Intensive public scrutiny can bring about, voluntarily, many of the needed improvements in a system where little enlightenment in the past has occurred.

I, therefore, ask each one of my colleagues to join me in supporting this resolution and take pride in commending the efforts of the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR) for his constructive, and what I believe are effective, recommendations.

Mr. WYMAN. Mr. Speaker, as a cosponsor of House Resolution 850, I want to join the very distinguished gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR) in bringing to the attention of our colleagues the sometimes tragic and needlessly depressing existence of so many of our senior citizens in certain of our Nation's nursing homes.

As the able gentleman has pointed out, an industry or business which allegedly receives $2 billion in tax money annually and purportedly is performing a public service responsible for the health and welfare of well over a million Americans, merits the close attention of Congress. When poor living conditions and inadequate care are forced upon dependent elderly persons for the sake of profit—when government neglects the needy and fails to respond to those for whom it is ultimately responsible—when an American citizen cannot look forward to dignity and a reasonable degree of comfort in his later years, then Congress should be compelled to investigate and see what can be done to reform such a poor situation.

House Resolution 850, by creating a select committee to investigate excessive profits and develop a national policy toward nursing home care, will meet the obligation which the legislative branch must live up to.

Congressman PRYOR is to be commended for his unusual and selfless work in this area. His concern shows a rare sensitivity toward the problems of senior Americans, and the Members of this body would do well to assist him in his efforts to bring about better living conditions for those confined to nursing homes because of ill health or the absence of resources of relatives or friends that would enable senior citizens to enjoy the degree of independence during their twilight years that they deserve.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, this year we will mark the fifth anniversary of the enactment of the medicare program. This long-overdue legislation finally gave some recognition to the fact that our older citizens, as a group, have exceptionally heavy needs for medical care at a time of life when they can least afford to pay for that care. The 1965 medicare law went a long way toward meeting these needs, particularly with respect to hospital and medical care for illnesses of brief or moderate duration. There are, however, a number of areas in which a great deal remains to be done, and one of the most pressing problems is the problem of nursing home care.

Today there are about 20 million Americans aged 65 or over. Many of them fortunately are in good health and are able to live by themselves or with relatives and to take care of their own needs. But this is not always the case. Too often our older citizens suffer disabling illnesses, illnesses which require institutional care for long periods of time—months or even years. Except in a long-range sense through the support of medical research, we cannot do much to prevent this type of need from arising, but we can assure that, when the need does arise, it is met with care which is at least adequate in terms of both quantity and quality. To do any less would be a disgrace, and I am ashamed to say that today we are doing far, far less. The number of facilities does not approach the need, and all too often the facilities that do exist do not provide an acceptable level of care. In fact, conditions in some of our nursing homes can only be described as shocking.

There are, of course, some very excellent nursing homes, and there has been considerable impetus given to the expansion and upgrading of nursing home care as a result of such legislation as the medicare and medicaid programs. Also, in the field of veterans care, recent legislation has placed greater emphasis on nursing home care. But all these efforts have not been enough, and this is particularly true with respect to nursing care for the chronically ill. In fact, the laws passed in recent years have put so much emphasis on improving short-term nursing home care that the net result may have been a deterioration in the type and quantity of care available for those who need such care for an extended period of time. By limiting payments under medicare and medicaid to facilities providing the highly skilled services needed for relatively short-term care, we may have lessened the incentive on the part of those best able to provide quality nursing home care to enter or remain in the long-term care field.

I am not, of course, suggesting that we should not continue to upgrade the quality of the high-skill type of facility. The development and expansion of these institutions must be continued. But I am deeply concerned with the lack of adequate provisions for those who have chronic illnesses and who may need only custodial care. We must make improvements in this area. We must develop new programs to see that facilities offering such care are constructed, and we should make whatever changes are necessary in the laws governing medicare and medicaid so that our older citizens may be able to obtain whatever level of care they need. For our veterans, for whose medical care this country bears the most direct responsibility, we must provide sufficient funds to allow a great expansion of the nursing home care provided by the Veterans' Administration.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate by Mr. Arrington, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to a concurrent resolution of the Senate of the following title:

S. Con. Res. 59. Concurrent resolution to provide for the adjournment of the Congress from March 26, 1970, until March 31, 1970.

YEAR OF THE VOTER

(Mr. MELCHER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. Speaker, the League of Women Voters of the United States has declared 1970 "The Year of the Voter."

It has enlisted a score of national organizations in a crusade to encourage every American to exercise his, and her, right to vote and help make democracy work. The organizations hope that the crusade will be marked by special events in every town, county, city, and State in the Nation.

I think it will be especially appropriate if Congress helps get this crusade off to a good start by extending the right to vote to our 18-year-old citizens. In this day and age, they are well enough informed to be intelligent electors.

The Senate has passed the 18-year-old voting rights provision sponsored by Montana's Senator MIKE MANSFIELD. There is going to be some opposition to it in the House, mostly from those who fear anything new.

But there is also going to be a young and aggressive group of House Members, with whom I will be associated, making a fight to assure its passage, and we expect to win.

Much of the unrest we are experiencing in this Nation today is a result of a growing feeling that citizens are left out of the decisionmaking process. And the young people who make up the bulk of our Armed Forces and the bulk of our lower paid work forces want a voice in our government. With a voting age at 21, half of the first time voters never get to vote in a presidential election until they are past 23.

Every citizen with the right to vote can have a voice in government. The League of Women Voters' "Year of the Voter" is a worthy effort to demonstrate that fact.

Extending the vote to 18-year-olds will extend the right to participate to a group of young citizens who are entitled to that right and be a great start for the "Year of the Voter."

And we can wind it up appropriately next November with a record turnout at the polls.

I hope everyone will help make this the biggest year of the voter in our national history.

A PROPER MEMORIAL TO VIETNAM WAR DEAD

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, on March 25, 1969, just 1 year ago, I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the names and hometowns of the 31,379 American men who had died in hostile action in Vietnam at the time Richard Nixon became President of the United States.

Covering 121 pages of fine print, the listing was, I felt, the most graphic and adequate way to present the grim cost of the Vietnam war to the people of this country, and to give an accurate measurement of Mr. Nixon's most burdensome inheritance.

Over the year that followed, it served as a focal point for those who felt that the Vietnam policy of the previous administration was wrong and had to be reversed.

It also served to explain with mute eloquence that only war dead can muster just why the new President embarked upon the policy of reversal now well advanced.

Reversal it has been. Casualties have been cut in half. The weekly lists of war dead, instead of spiraling upward, are down. The responsibility for ground combat has shifted from American to Vietnamese shoulders. Instead of a buildup in troop levels, a substantial reduction has been achieved. The total in Vietnam is now nearly 100,000 less than a year ago, and a further substantial reduction has been announced for the coming months. Instead of steadily growing violence, the war has been "wound down."

All this is cause for rejoicing and thanksgiving. Yet despite these positive steps toward peace, the toll of war has continued for many families. The anguish over a dead or maimed body is not lessened for loved ones by the fact that fewer families experience such grief.

Yesterday I learned of a young soldier from my district critically ill from battle wounds that required the amputation of both legs. He and his family will find it difficult to find cause for rejoicing and thanksgiving. So will the family of another constituent killed by hostile action just a few days earlier.

Unfortunately the anguish they experience has cast its shadow over many homes in the past year. Three times in 1969—in April, July, and December—I felt required to supplement the original Vietnam roll of honor.

I do so again today, listing the names and hometowns of 1,159 men who were killed in Vietnam by hostile action in just 3 months of last year—October, November, and December. These names bring to 40,551 the total killed since American participation in the war began. Prior listings may be found as follows:

Mar. 25, 1969 (through January 1969)	31,379
Apr. 3, 1969 (February and March 1969)	2,148
July 22, 1969 (April and May 1969)	2,866
Dec. 2, 1969 (June through September 1969)	2,999
Mar. 26, 1970 (October through December 1969)	1,159
Total	40,551

The new listing brings to 9,172 the number killed during the 11 months immediately following President Nixon's inauguration. This total demonstrates the terrible momentum of 5 years of mistaken policy.

Although Mr. Nixon undoubtedly made the decision to end American ground combat involvement even before he took the oath of office, and certainly has pressed vigorously with its implementation ever since, the stark inescapable fact is that 9,172 men lost their lives in the period of transition—Vietnamization. The total casualties—dead and wounded—for this period was 73,819.

The staggering cost of disengagement, in terms of lives lost and injured, when added to the even greater cost of the earlier buildup period, demands—yes, demands—that the Vietnam war result in something more than a dismal account in the history books. The losses have been too immense and tragic for the American people to be satisfied with a pious and quickly forgotten affirmation that this must not happen again.

We must discover the flaw in our governmental system which permitted this great tragedy to develop, and then act to correct it.

If the deaths of 40,551 men shall not have been in vain, we must erect new safeguards to prevent error, and we must do so now, while the agony of the war is plainly in sight. Memory is short, even of 40,551 deaths, and if we put off the construction of safeguards until the war is ended, other pressing problems may quickly divert public attention.

The problem is one that requires the attention of the Congress, even more than that of the President.

Our President has given assurances that he will avoid future Vietnams. As the conflict grows in Laos and instability threatens Cambodia, he has moved to reassure Congress and the American people that he has no intention of introducing American ground combat troops without first seeking prior congressional approval.

This is all that reasonably can be expected of the President at this juncture, but it is not all that can be expected of the Congress. It is essential that the Congress examine carefully the possibility of other U.S. military involvements similar to the one in Vietnam. No one can accurately forecast the intensity of emotion and political pressure that may be brought to bear suddenly upon Mr. Nixon or his successors in behalf of military action in various parts of the world.

If experience has taught us anything, it has shown how fragile peace really is, and how difficult it is to draw the fine line between U.S. involvement as a provider of noncombat military support and U.S. involvement in combat itself. In recent years the President has assumed to his own office the difficult chore of drawing that fine line. The responsibility is too great and too grave to place in the hands of any man, even the President of the United States, and even one as experienced and chastened as President Nixon. This fact was clearly acknowledged by the men who drafted our Constitution.

Difficult as the chore may be, the Constitution clearly charges the Congress, not the President, with the responsibility for drawing the line between peace and war.

The Constitution places exclusively in the hands of the Congress the responsibility and authority to declare war, raise and support military forces, and to provide for their regulation.

Too often, Congress has shirked this responsibility. It has shrunk from decisions and judgments which were difficult and awesome. It is not natural to grasp the nettle of basic decision if the chore can be left to others. It is more comfortable—easier—to relax in the relatively passive role of supply sergeant to the nation's military needs, a role that has become the custom of Congress in recent years.

Nevertheless, neglect of its constitutional duty does not absolve the Congress of responsibility for the 40,551 lives lost as a direct consequence of our inaction. Our responsibility is just as real as if we had actually declared war in 1965, for the result has been the same. And we had the power to change it.

The experience has been a great teacher. We have learned that a war effort carried forward by gradualism and without the unifying force of formal congressional approval is gravely shortchanged. We have found that a limited military response ordered on his own by the President can lead the Nation into a paralyzing quagmire. It can leave the Nation divided, uncertain and immobilized, and military forces demoralized.

It may be that in the future the public interest will require that our forces engage in military action, even in distant places. But let the decision to do so result from the proper, wise safeguards built into our constitutional system.

Let the Congress fulfill the fundamental role of decisionmaker, not because such is the pleasure of the President, but because it is demanded by public interest and the Constitution itself.

Let the decision to send troops, or not to do so, result from a synthesizing vote—an action which will help forge a unified public will behind national policy.

Let us lift from the shoulders of the President the warmaking authority which no one should wish to exercise on his own.

The Vietnam roll of honor is a final tribute to men who answered in the most supreme way possible when their country called. Those of us privileged to live on, and especially those of us who have served in the Congress during these grave years, can erect the most fitting monument to these heroes by recementing the foundation of our constitutional system. The separation of powers which gave the Congress, not the President, the greatest authority in military policy, has fallen into disrepair and needs to be rebuilt along original lines.

The monument we erect to those who died must give maximum assurance that no future war will be fought without prior congressional approval. Congress alone can build that monument, because it must be done through the legislative process.

Today I am introducing a joint resolution which hopefully will be the first step in erecting the monument. It recognizes the fundamental constitutional reservation to the Congress of the power of the sword. It clarifies the circumstances in which the President has the implied responsibility, and authority, to take military action without first securing congressional approval. It also establishes a reporting procedure which will, I feel, give greater assurance that future war of American military forces will be strictly within constitutional bounds.

Here is the text of the resolution:

H.J. RES. 1151

Whereas, the Constitution of the United States specifies that "The Congress shall have power . . . to declare war", "to raise and support armies", "to provide and maintain a Navy", and "to provide for calling forth the Militia to . . . repel invasions"; and

Whereas, the Constitution of the United States specifies that "The Congress shall have power . . . to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Office thereof": Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That,

Section 1. The Congress finds that there are three circumstances where the President of the United States is not required by the Constitution to seek and obtain prior Congressional approval before committing military personnel to foreign territory. These three circumstances are—

1. to repel an attack upon the United States, its citizens or property, or those under its protection;

2. to protect from imminent peril the lives and property of United States citizens; and

3. to fulfill an obligation to commit military personnel set forth explicitly by treaty or legislative enactment.

SEC. 2. To enable the Congress to fulfill its responsibilities under the Constitution, the President of the United States shall, within 48 hours following the issue of orders committing military personnel to foreign territory without first obtaining prior approval of Congress, submit to the Congress a full report delineating (1) the circumstances necessitating such commitment of military personnel and (2) the justification for committing personnel without prior congressional approval. Such report shall be in writing or delivered by the President to a joint session of the Congress.

I believe the three instances specified in the resolution are the only ones in which the President may properly commit military personnel without first obtaining approval of Congress. They are widely recognized as being among the implied powers of the Chief Executive.

The problem is to restrict these powers to proper bounds. These exceptions to Congress' general warmaking authority should be strictly construed. A President cannot properly invoke as authorization the need to protect American lives or property when in fact there is no clear showing of danger to such at the time of intervention.

The power to repel attack is not unlimited. As with the protection of lives and property, this authority permits only a limited response to a specific situation, and it terminates when the need for self-defense terminates.

Beyond this, any proper—that is to say, constitutional—intervention by American forces must be preceded by specific congressional approval.

In all candor, it must be admitted that loose interpretation of implied warmaking powers has been common practice, especially in recent history.

That is why my resolution imposes a reporting requirement upon the President, charging him with the duty within 48 hours of ordering military personnel to foreign territory to report formally and directly to the Congress, giving the justification for the action and the authority under which the action was taken.

In the area of obligations under treaties or legislation, the examples of authorization to which the President may appeal are rare indeed. Under the NATO treaty we have—wisely, I think—set up a unified command, and the treaty holds that an attack upon any member of NATO is to be followed immediately by military response by our forces. Here, a treaty, properly ratified and clarified, has prescribed as being essential to the security of our Nation a course of automatic commitment of forces under certain conditions. It is unique in this respect.

The Middle East resolution at the time of enactment was interpreted by Secretary of State Dulles as conveying to the President the authority, without congressional approval, to use military force in certain circumstances in that area. It, too, is unique in this respect, and frankly, I believe it should be amended to require congressional approval before forces can be moved.

The resolution I have introduced is intended to help restore to Congress its proper role in setting fundamental military policy for our Nation.

Had it been in effect when President Kennedy first considered sending combat forces to Vietnam it might well have given him pause. It would have required that, within 48 hours of issuing orders for the troop movement, the President would have had either to present in writing to the Congress or explain personally by appearing before a joint session the circumstances that impelled this troop movement and the precise justification for not coming to Congress first. Could he have cited attack, threat to American lives and property, or the clear requirements of a treaty? To do so might have stretched credulity. Confronted with this dilemma, it is my opinion that President Kennedy would not have sent the troops, or, if he did, he would have first gone to Congress for a clear expression of approval.

It may be argued that this resolution is a prescription for inaction, that the process of congressional approval is too cumbersome and lengthy to meet the requirements of the modern world. However, the facts are otherwise. Congress can act speedily when circumstances require. The law which prevented a rail strike, just a month ago completed the entire legislative process in less than 4 hours. To be sure, the process would hopefully cause the President to be very careful and selective in using our military forces on foreign territory, but what is wrong with that? The main purpose of the resolution is to keep the President from mistaken military policy.

The resolution seeks to define the proper limits of presidential power, and thereby build a suitable monument to those who have died in consequence of improper use of this power.

Impelled by the sacrifices of our men in Vietnam, its enactment could help assure that these sacrifices were not in vain.

The 1,159 names listed below, together with the 39,392 names listed previously in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, summon us of the Congress to meet our responsibilities to future generations with appropriate courage and devotion to duty:

WHY NOT COMPETITION FOR THE POST OFFICE?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. CRANE) is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, in recent days there has been much said about the situation that confronts our Nation because of the recent breakdown in our postal system. Despite the rhetoric, the charges and countercharges that have been leveled, it seems to me that the question of the greatest importance has been consistently overlooked.

The primary question is not one of wages or working conditions. I believe that it is this: How can we best see that the mail is delivered from one point to another, speedily and accurately, in this great Nation of ours?

Many of my colleagues have pointed out that the recent strike by postal employees is illegal. This is a statement of fact. Others have pointed to the validity of the demands being made by the postal employees. Here, too, there is much truth.

Nonetheless, not one of my colleagues, to the best of my knowledge, has looked for a means of solving the underlying problem so that a similar crisis cannot erupt in the future.

Some maintain that the President's plan for a postal corporation to take over the functions of the Post Office would be a panacea. I deny that.

Some maintain that the Congress must retain its traditional role over this monopoly service of the Federal Government. I deny that.

What no one seems to have recognized is that our postal system, by its very nature as a Government monopoly, cannot function efficiently. As a monopoly, there is no incentive to change, to modernize, or to improve postal services.

My response to this crisis, therefore, is somewhat different. I believe that it is time for the Congress to act to improve our postal system by providing for the Post Office the same stimulant that has brought American business and industry to its high peak of achievement: competition.

Legislative action should be taken to eliminate the monopoly that is exercised by the Post Office Department over the delivery of mail. Private carriers should be permitted to enter into competition with the Post Office, so that the carrier who provides the most efficient service at the most reasonable price may prevail.

Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing such legislation. The basic intention of my bill is to repeal those provisions of title 39 of the United States Code that prohibit the private carriage of mail. Further, it will repeal that provision of title 18 of the United States Code which makes the private carriage of mail a criminal offense.

Our traditional governmental policy has been to oppose the concentration of economic power in a monopoly. This is evident from the fact that we long ago established the Federal regulatory agencies. It is clear from the Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts. However, it is not apparent from our policy with regard to mail service.

Mr. Speaker, permit me to ask a rhetorical question. Why should the Government continue to exercise a monopoly over the area of postal service, when it would not permit private enterprise to exercise monopoly power over any other area of our economy?

I realize that some of my colleagues will say that if we open the door to competition we will be faced with a deficit-ridden governmental agency that will be left to deliver only those items unprofitable for private enterprise. Now this may indeed turn out to be the case. If so, it seems to me that basic economics would dictate that we determine the real costs of those services, and see that individuals, businesses, or other users are held responsible for paying them.

It is intriguing to speculate on what would happen if this bill were to be passed. How would private enterprise respond to the lifting of the longstanding ban on private carriers of mail? One can only conjecture. But American private enterprise, through all of our history, has never failed to rise to any challenge; and there is no real reason to expect our vital private sector to do so now.

The telephone and telegraph systems have long been available as alternatives to the postal system, and today's advancing technology has provided others, such as the transmission of printed data over telephone lines. I think we can anticipate just such a response from the free, dynamic private sector of our economy to the challenge of opportunity presented by the legislation I propose.

That this legislation would indeed provide a tremendous and exciting challenge to the private sector has already been demonstrated on a relatively small, but nonetheless substantial, scale. When the Postmaster General first addressed the Nation on the recent strike, then localized in New York City, he temporarily repealed the prohibitions on private mail carriers for the duration of the emergency. Overnight, driven by necessity, a wide range of alternatives to the Post Office began to operate: Private messenger services, transcontinental couriers, armored bank vans, and the like. And this was only an immediate, unplanned, and unprepared response to a presumably temporary need. Have we so little faith in the free enterprise system that we cannot see how much more effective its response could be if developed and implemented with careful planning and improved over the long run by technological progress?

And why should we not permit the free enterprise system to function in this area? Can anyone offer any rational excuse? Can anyone put forward a reasonable explanation, other than the defense of archaic 19th century edicts to the contrary? For a Nation that considers itself a leader in technological advancement, to allow efficient mail service to be hindered by a prohibition on private carriers is ludicrous in the extreme. As we approach the end of the 20th century, with our eyes on the future in all other aspects of life, why should we force our mail service to remain a relic of ages past?

At this point, let me address myself particularly to my colleagues on the other side of the aisle. Those of my political and philosophical persuasion are often characterized as being opposed to change. Let me urge my colleagues across the aisle to rise to the occasion and prove that when a member of the minority introduces legislation that does call for substantial change, he will be greeted with an open mind that transcends political and ideological lines. And to my collegues on this side of the aisle, I say this: We who are so often criticized for being opposed to change have always maintained that we will gladly support constructive change. This legislation offers us the opportunity to prove the truth of that statement.

Far more important, however, is the fact that this legislation will constitute an important step toward an efficient postal system, a system that will bring into play the energies and technological expertise of our dynamic private sector and permit the free, competitive market to operate, insuring for us all that our mail can be delivered with the maximum feasible speed and accuracy at minimum cost. And that, after all, is what our responsibility, as Members of Congress, demands.

Mr. Speaker, I include the text of the bill in the RECORD at this point.

H.R. 16691

A bill to repeal certain provisions of law relating to the private carriage of letters, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) sections 901 and 902 of title 39, United States Code, relating to the private carriage of letters, are repealed.

(d) (1) Section 1699 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by inserting "except where carried by private express and" immediately after "nearest post office,".

(2) Such section 1699 is further amended by inserting "except where carried by private express and" immediately after "under my power or control,".

BLACK AND WHITE: THE DOUBLE STANDARD FOR CONFIRMING JUSTICES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. WAGGONNER) is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. WAGGONNER. Mr. Speaker, shortly after President Johnson nominated Judge Thurgood Marshall to the post of Solicitor General of the United States, I addressed the House to point out to the Members of this body and the Senate a sampling of his membership in Communist-front organizations, his long record of association with Communists, and his widely quoted remarks criticizing the loyalty program of this Government. My words fell on deaf ears because Marshall was supported by the liberals, the radicals, and the New and Old Left.

I specifically called attention to his membership on the national committee of the International Juridical Association, an organization cited by the House Committee on Un-American Activities as a Communist front which actively defended Communists and consistently followed the Communist Party line.

The other body was not interested in this patently Red background of the judge because President Johnson said he was an honorable man. I also reminded the House and Senate that Marshall had been on the executive board of the National Lawyers Guild which has also been cited as a Communist front by the House Committee on Un-American Activities with the description that it was the foremost legal bulwark of the Communist Party in the United States.

The other body was not interested in this patently Red background of the judge because President Johnson said he was an honorable man.

I called the attention of the House and Senate to the fact that Marshall had, in 1948, appeared on a forum held here in Washington for the purpose of attacking the loyalty program of our Government.

The other body was not interested in this patently Red background of the judge because President Johnson said he was an honorable man.

I cited the fact that, at another time in his past, Marshall had come to the defense of the so-called Hollywood 10, a group of suspected Communist sympathizers.

But the other body was not interested in this patently Red background of the judge because President Johnson said he was an honorable man.

Finally, I recalled to the Members of the House and Senate a statement of Judge Marshall which he confirmed under oath before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. Judge Marshall stated:

I want you to understand that when us colored folks take over, every time a white man draws a breath, he'll have to pay a fine.

But the other body was not interested in this racist philosophy espoused by the judge because President Johnson said he was an honorable man.

When the appropriate Senate subcommittee conducted its so-called hearing on the Judge's nomination, only two members of the committee even bothered to show up for the meeting. As far as I know, no other member of either body raised a voice in protest.

The double standard which the other body employs when, on the other hand, a nominee to high judicial post is both white and southern, has become disgustingly plain during the consideration of Judge Carswell. The fact that he may have had some knowledge of a racial covenant on a piece of property in 1948 is of major, even, earth-shaking import. The fact that, in that same year, Judge Marshall was addressing a meeting in Washington attacking the loyalty program of this Nation meant nothing at all, because, after all, who would dare question the loyalty of a Negro from the North? Or, again after all, who had the temerity to question the loyalty of a Negro from the North at a time when the President was desperately scouring the country for a black man he could groom for the Supreme Court so he would go down in history as the first President to appoint one? And yet again, after all, what are a few Communist fronts among friends? Some of my best friends, and so forth.

The qualifications of the Negro judge might not have stood up under the kind of scrutiny which has been given to the background of the white Floridian, either. What were the qualifications of Judge Marshall? They were then and they are now a matter of record, a totally undistinguished practice in Baltimore until he was employed by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Had he remained in private practice, Thurgood Marshall would never have been heard of outside the city limits of Baltimore. He was nominated to be Solicitor General of the United States because President Johnson wanted a Negro for this post at the height of the civil rights fever. If Justice Marshall thinks otherwise, and I doubt that he does, he knows he sits on the Supreme Court today because of the color of his skin.

It now seems that Judge Carswell may not sit on that same bench because of the color of his.

This double standard is no credit to the other body. If Judge Carswell is not confirmed or if enough Members dodge their responsibility by hiding behind a recommital motion, they deserve no more than the disdain with which they will be held by the people.

The nomination of Judge Carswell offers an opportunity for the other body to redeem itself for what it did in 1967 when it railroaded the nomination of Judge Marshall. Judge Carswell does not ask for that kind of treatment. He asks only for an honest, unprejudiced, and impartial examination. He deserves it. The Nation deserves it. The question is: Is the other body fairminded enough to give it to him?

SPECIAL MEDAL TO HONOR DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Massachusetts (Mrs. HECKLER), is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mrs. HECKLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the life of the late Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., exemplifies the highest ideals of our American democracy. I am today introducing a bill to assist in perpetuating his memory by the striking of a special medal in honor of Dr. King.

I consider it especially fitting that this bill authorizes the President to present the gold medal to Mrs. Coretta King, his brave widow who has carried forward the ideals of Dr. King. Duplicate medals in bronze will be struck for the use of Morehouse College, his alma mater, and the Martin Luther King, Jr. Memorial Center in their fundraising efforts. These funds are to be appropriately used for such purposes as providing scholarships to needy students and to preserve Dr. King's memorabilia.

I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, that a number of our colleagues have agreed to join in the introduction of this bill and that a similar bill will also be introduced today in the other body.

We will not forget Dr. King's words, "I have a dream." It was his dream that all Americans should have equal rights and opportunities. Dr. King believed that justice could be obtained under the law.

He directed his energies not at destruction of a society, in which serious problems had arisen, but at finding constructive solutions to these problems. His work received worldwide recognition when he was awarded 1964 Nobel Peace Prize. When he turned his cheek to his foes, as he inevitably did because he believed so fervently in nonviolence, he was struck down by an assassin's bullet. But I think Dr. King's work will not be left unfinished. He inspired many to dedicate themselves to his high ideals.

We have far to go to eliminate prejudice, bigotry and hate, but the example provided by Dr. Martin Luther King gives hope that the barriers to the fulfillment of every American's potential can be eliminated by peaceful means. I share this belief and I am proud to honor the man who inspired it.

I hope that the Congress will take immediate and positive action to enact this proposal to honor Martin Luther King.

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Speaker, the tragedy of my generation is that we have already had to strike medals, mint coins, and dedicate memorials to several of our contemporaries who were also our leaders. Martin Luther King, Jr., is one of these fallen leaders. It gives me little pleasure to be a cosponsor of this legislation, but it is a fitting testimonial to Dr. King's memory. I can think of no more appropriate words for this occasion than to repeat several lines of Yevegeny Yevtushenko from his poem "Mayakovsky":

Being dead, he has become "The best and most talented"—
Alive he would have been declared an enemy of the people.
And if that shot hadn't rung out,
Not seeking for himself reward and fame,
Like so many—he would have remained honest,
Dragging the epoch on his shoulders.
No, he wouldn't have yielded,
Wouldn't have broken—
He, like a spearhead would have led us forward.

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to join with the gentlewoman from Massachusetts in introducing a bill to honor Dr. Martin Luther King by the striking of a special medal.

The inscription on Dr. King's grave reads:

Free at last, free at last, thank God Almighty, I'm free at last.

The words proclaim both the glory and tragedy of his life and death.

For a black man in America to find his freedom only in death is the shame of this Nation. Dr. King loved this country but he hated its injustice. And so he dreamed of reconciliation someday between love and hate, between black and white. T. S. Eliot once wrote:

Between the idea and the reality falls the shadow.

We live in that shadow and it is darker now without Dr. King.

So let us strike this medal in his honor and then get on with his dream. There is so much to be done and so little time.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, I want to join my colleagues in honoring the memory of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., by joining my colleague from Massachusetts (Mrs. HECKLER) in introducing a bill to strike a special medal which will commemorate the life of this extraordinary American.

Mr. Speaker, I am particularly pleased that these medals in bronze will be struck for the use of Morehouse College, his alma mater, and if the Martin Luther King, Jr. Memorial Center to aid in their efforts to provide student scholarships and to preserve Dr. King's memorabilia.

Dr. King, ordained a Baptist minister in 1947, began his leadership in the civil rights movement in 1956 when he led a successful boycott of Montgomery, Ala., public transportation by Negro riders protesting Jim Crow practices. He quickly became the most prominent leader in the nonviolent civil rights movement, which led to the Civil Rights Acts of 1964 and 1965.

In 1966, Dr. King took his crusade for racial equality to the North—to Chicago. There, in the manner of the 16th century religious reformer whose name he bore, he affixed to the city hall door his demands for housing, welfare, education, and job reform. Throughout that year, Dr. King commuted to the South to continue his crusade in Mississippi.

The marches in Mississippi pointed up the divergence of moderates and militants in the civil rights movement. While refusing to repudiate "black power" advocates, Dr. King sought a rapprochement among all in the civil rights movement. His nonviolent efforts to bring about change won him international recognition in 1964, when he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize.

Mr. Speaker, we should remember, in honoring Dr. King, that his first commitment was to the fulfillment of the America democracy as a just society. We must rededicate ourselves to this goal for which he lived and died—a plural society based on mutual respect and self-respect.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that passage of this bill will be a first step to a further recognition of Dr. King by the creation of a national holiday in his memory—literally, a holy day when we remember his good works.

Mr. Speaker, I insert at this point in the RECORD an article written by Henry Fairlie in 1968 in Encounter magazine, which I commend to my colleagues. It is an incisive discussion of Dr. King's leadership. The article follows:

MARTIN LUTHER KING

(By Henry Fairlie)

"You can liberate a free man, but you cannot liberate a slave." That is the first and the last thing to be said about Martin Luther King. Almost alone among American Negro leaders, he had ceased to be a slave. He had become a free man, who could be liberated as a human being. Almost every other American Negro leader, from the Uncle Toms to the SNCC extremists, is still bound in the wheel of slavery. Almost none can escape the memory of it. They are slaves still; and it is to slavery, like Nat Turner, that they react. Stokely Carmichael and H. Rap Brown are not yet free men. "It is the nature of slavery," says Louis Halle again, "to render its victims so abject that at last, fearing to be free, they multiply their own chains." This is the Black Power leader. He fastens fetters to himself even as he screams for freedom. Martin Luther King, almost alone, had escaped from slavery, whereas others have escaped only from the slave-owners. He had surmounted it, had left it behind, and could think and feel, act and speak, as a free man.

He was not a saint, he was a man; a whole and liberated man, while so many others, white as well as black, remained slaves. This was his greatness; and this, above all, was his prophecy.

Martin Luther King was given to America by the South. The South may have killed him—we do not know yet—but it was the South also which bore him. He himself would have made the acknowledgment. It meant everything that he was buried in a Baptist Church of the South, to the hymns of the South, to the rhetoric of the South, to the prayers of the South: the black South maybe, but still the South.

"Go gently into the South," I was advised when I first came to America 3 years ago, and I took the advice. I journeyed slowly through Virginia, through North Carolina and South Carolina, until at last I reached Georgia; and there, for a time, I stopped to survey the civilisation in which I had arrived, before pushing on to the dark interior of the South, in Alabama and Mississippi and Louisiana, where the civilisation has survived, until now, a closed and arrested society.

Like almost all who know the South, I found that I grew more and more fascinated by it: that I grew to love it and to fear it; and then to love it more and fear it more. Not the white South or the black South, but the South itself, in which, as W. J. Cash said, "Negro entered into white man as white man entered into Negro," the relationship between them "nothing less than organic." That the Negro problem in America was ceasing to be a Southern problem was one of the most directly personal difficulties which Martin Luther King encountered.

QUALITIES OF THE SOUTH

All the qualities of the South, as Cash pointed out, find expression in its fondness for rhetoric, a "gorgeous, primitive art, addressed to the autonomic system and not to the encephalon"; and in the South, from the beginning, "there was the daily impact upon the white man of the example of the Negro, concerning whom nothing is so certain as his remarkable tendency to seize on lovely words, to roll them in his throat, to heap them in redundant profusion one upon another until meaning vanishes and there is nothing left but the sweet, canorous drunkenness of sound."

I first heard Southern rhetoric at an annual, open-air, gathering of red-neck farmers in the tidelands of Virginia. I heard it again at a Ku Klux Klan rally, at Durham in North Carolina, a cross-burning preceded by hour upon hour of speeches, of primitive rhythm, of the "canorous drunkenness of sound." I heard it again from a sheriff, in front of a courthouse in Mississippi. But I heard it most often whenever I went to a Negro church in the South, and listened as the Biblical prose was churned into passionate oratory, flung by the preacher to his congregation in mounting cadences, until at last, all voluntary power surrendered, they flung back their Amens at every sentence. It is one of the sounds of the South which stay with me: the Amens of the white Klan rally and the black Baptist congregation, in the heaviness of the heat and the moist, impossible to tell apart, since the voice is the same, the voice of the South.

This was the instrument which Martin Luther King took from the South, translating it to his own use, until all America listened to it as its own prophecy, and even all the world listened and claimed it as its voice.

In the most famous passage of his most famous speech, before the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, in 1963, three centuries of the rhetoric of the South were pulled together into one exalted outburst. Every device ever contrived by every preacher of the South, black or white, was put to use, until his huge audience, black and white, had been carried beyond itself, no longer merely the sum of its members. He bit into the gathering Amens, the answering "Yeah! Yeah!", the thundering applause, for they were not to be allowed to rest, but were to be carried to a higher pitch with each ejaculation.

It went like this.

I have a dream that one day even the State of Mississippi, a desert sweltering with the heat of injustice and oppression—

"Yeah! Yeah!"—

will be transformed into an oasis of freedom and justice—

the Amens roll into the rising applause. He does not let them die:

I have a dream that my four little children—

"Amen! Amen!" "Yeah! Yeah!"— will one day live in a nation where they will not be judged by the colour of their skin but by the content of their character—the Amens and the applause swell. But he bites into them:

I have a dream today.

The applause rises, held now in anticipation of what is to come:

I have a dream that one day the State of Alabama. . . .

And so on, until he bites against into the applause, with the reiterated, "I have a dream today," as he carries the audience to the final:

I have a dream that one day every valley shall be exalted, every hill and mountain will be made low, the rough places will be made plain, and the crooked places will be made straight, and the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together.

Ben Shahn has done a drawing of Martin Luther King, in which the man seems to be part of the background of the Georgia soil and the Georgia sky. He was indeed, and this one must remember if one is to understand him, a gift of the South.

ONE OF THE SAD THINGS

One of the sad things about America today is that the South, which has so much to teach the North about the races living in close proximity, is unable to do so, partly as a result of its own defects, partly as a result of its own arrested development, partly because the problems in the North are not the same as the problems in the South, and partly because the terrible gap between the North and the South has not been bridged more than a century after the Civil War. That the South should at last have spoken to the North through one of its Negroes may seem a paradox or an irony. But it is merely another example of the truth in the man. With this truth within him, he took the violent rhetoric of the South—and his own was violent—and made it carry the message of nonviolence.

It is strange—and important—to remember how small was the issue with which he began his struggle for the civil rights of Negroes. One night, in Montgomery, Alabama, Rosa Parks, a Negro seamstress, got on a bus and sat down near the front. Following custom, the driver ordered her to give her seat to a white man and to move to the back. She refused. "I don't know why," she said later. "I was just tired. My feet hurt." She was prosecuted and fined. Martin Luther King called his first nonviolent protest: the Negro boycott of the buses. The bus company was driven to the verge of bankruptcy, and then capitulated. It desegregated its buses. Only a year before, in 1954, the U.S. Supreme Court had ordered the desegregation of public education.

But there is something else which helps, perhaps even more forcefully, to fix the time of Martin Luther King, and the context in which he acted. James Baldwin published Notes of a Native Son in 1957. Nobody Knows My Name and Another Country followed in 1961 and 1962. Father Malcolm Boyd recently said of them:

At his best, what did James Baldwin achieve? He let someone white get inside his black skin (not just any black skin, but Baldwin's own). The white person had a new experience, a rather shattering, personal one. In those curious pre-movement, pre-revolution days, he found out from Baldwin how quite precisely, it makes an absolute major difference in this society what kind of skin one wears. Then the reader, racist or liberal, bigot or paternalist, had to take a further step, face a simpler and greater truth—that skin is essentially skin.

This, of course, is precisely what the Black Power leader today denies. Skin, he says, is not essentially skin: it is mind and heart and soul and being. He proclaims his skin. He has no desire to let the white man inside his skin anymore than he wishes to get inside the white man's skin. Neither Stokely Carmichael nor H. Rap Brown could use the term, "skin deep." They deny the common humanity which lies beneath the skin, and so logically preach apartheid.

Did Martin Luther King and James Baldwin, then, merely serve their hour, and have they now been overtaken? Was Martin Luther King a man for one season only, or for all seasons? No one who knew him denies that the new leaders' assertion of their "blackness" or "négritude" was a deeply personal challenge to him: that he examined himself and his position with an exacting and painful rigour, before emerging, in the last few months of his life, with his old beliefs intact, still persuaded that integration, and not apartheid, was the right course. His march on Washington was to be a march of the poor. His opposition to the war in Viet Nam was the opposition of a pacifist. His witness was still to be the witness of a man, black or white. It could not be otherwise, unless he were to enslave himself, were to cease to act as a liberated man.

NO WHITE MAN CAN DISMISS

No white man can easily dismiss the furious emotions which nourish the Black Power movement, and which it in turn nourishes. Yet the white man must try to speak and act as a liberated man, too: liberated from the feelings of guilt which prevent him from offering his own views frankly. I have taken considerable trouble to read the literature of the Black Power movement, and I have not the slightest doubt that it is a reactionary one. It can lead nowhere but back. Its end can only be slavery to slavery. Separate Negro states would be slave states, in mind and temper, perhaps even in regulation. This new self-enslavement is noticeable in the most recent writings of Negroes like LeRoi Jones. Father Malcolm Boyd, again, has pointed to the new sterotype of the Negro which is being created in these post-movement, post-revolution days: "A stereotype needs to be removed, so that underneath it a person who is an artist may find himself. . . ."

It was the black stereotype—whether created, first, by the white man or, now, by the Negro himself—which Martin Luther King consistently rejected throughout his career. He would have none of it; and he could have none of it because, to him, a stereotype was simply another form of slavery. He would no more enslave himself to a stereotype than to a slave-owner; and he would not ask his people to do so. In this, he knew them well. There is no such personality, individual or collective, as the American Negro. Martin Luther King had good reason to know this: when Mayor Wagner called him to Harlem during the riots of 1964, the people there gave him a hostile reception. It was inevitable that they should do so. The cultural diversity of the American Negroes is remarkable, and there is little the Negroes of Harlem have in common with the Negroes of the SCLC (Southern Christian Leadership Conference). This is one reason why the Black Power leaders have no real base, why they move from city to city taking advantage of whatever situations they find favourable, why they are themselves so divided amongst themselves. There is no Black People to whom to give Black Power. Of all people, the American Negroes, with their diverse experiences, cannot be enslaved in a stereotype.

WE ARE ALL A LITTLE LESS SLAVES

Martin Luther King had a base. In recent years, he stubbed his toes many times not only against the white communities of the North, but also against their black communities. His march of the poor on Washington was, essentially, a return to his true base. The marchers were to be drawn from all over the country, but their core was to come from the South: the temper was to be the temper of the South. The mule wagon which drew his body at his funeral was intentionally symbolic: and how far it seemed from the conditions—and the looting and the arson—of the Northern cities.

It does Martin Luther King no honour not to recognise the character of his base. Donald B. Gibson has recently pointed out the "absurdity of the notion that there are Negro leaders who may speak for the Negro in the same sense that leaders of countries, communities, or religious sects, may speak for their citizens or congregations. . . ." Martin Luther King was, to this extent, a politician with a base in exactly the same way as Adam Clayton Powell is a politician with a base. The Negro in the North, in fact, has always had every reason to disclaim Martin Luther King's leadership. Yet from this narrow base—as narrow as any held by any Negro leader—he had, by the time he died, established an exceptional position, and it is this that is remarkable.

During the days after his death, I asked an American friend how he would summarise the real importance of Martin Luther King. He thought for a moment, and then said: "I guess he was the first Negro leader to show that he had the capacity to survive. After all, there he was, fourteen years after it all began, still at the head. . . ." From the bus boycott in Montgomery to a movement which deserves to be called a revolution: and still there, was Martin Luther King. The gathering momentum of the revolution had not swept him away. He had suffered setbacks; but he never sank beneath the flood. As the revolution became more and more violent, there was every temptation for him to become more and more extreme; instead, he came back, and back again, and then back again, his views, his character, his ambitions, his position, all unchanged. He did not modify, nor qualify. Yet he survived. There is only one possible explanation, and of how few men in history can it be said: there was a truth in the man which no temptation could bend and no opposition could break.

What Robert Bolt says of Thomas More, in his introduction to A Man For All Seasons, can with the smallest adjustments be said of Martin Luther King:

Thomas More, as I wrote about him, became for me a man with an adamantine sense of his own self. He knew where he began and left off, what area of himself he could yield to the encroachments of his enemies, and what to the encroachments of those he loved. It was a substantial area in both cases. . . . Since he was a clever man and a great lawyer, he was able to retire from those areas in wonderfully good order, but at length he was asked to retreat from the final area where he located his self. And there this . . . person set like metal, was overtaken by an absolutely primitive rigour, and could be no more budged than a cliff.

His followers in Atlanta held up the banner: "Free At Last." One can hardly quarrel with so deeply Christian a legend for so deeply Christian a man. Yet he seemed to me the free man here on earth. He did not have to wait for the assassin to be liberated. By some marvel, born in the hills of the South, he had freed himself; and freed the rest of us a little; freed us especially from our fears.

We are all a little less slaves as a result of Martin Luther King's life.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mrs. HECKLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

CRIMINAL BOMBINGS MUST BE STOPPED

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PRICE), for 10 minutes.

Mr. PRICE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join the distinguished gentleman from Ohio (Mr. MCCULLOCH) and other concerned Members in introducing the President's proposals to stop the rash of criminal bombings sweeping the Nation.

These senseless acts of wanton destruction, committed under the guise of political idealism, are but the first stages of a violent revolutionary movement which threatens to destroy American institutions and traditions. The perpetrators range from anarchists to Communists; but whatever their political motivation, they have joined in an orgy of violence against our country and our people.

These outrages must be stopped and stopped quickly, before any more innocent individuals are injured or killed and before any more property is damaged or destroyed. To date, however, the difficulty has been that the anarchists, militant leftists. and Communists, have formed separate revolutionary cells from which their terroristic activities have sprung. The separate identity of these cells has made police detection and prevention extremely difficult, for the organized conspiracy runs deep underground rather than openly and brazenly as does the so-called peace movement.

In response to the rash of bombings, President Nixon has proposed strengthening and expanding the existing Federal law which makes the transport of explosives across State lines, a Federal crime under certain circumstances. These proposals are well conceived. They clearly define the circumstances under which the law should be applied. They set forth explicit standards regarding what are punishable offenses. They greatly increase penalties for violators.

More specifically, the bill proposes that—

Anyone involved in the transport or receipt in commerce of explosives, intending their unlawful use, be made subject to imprisonment for 10 years or a fine of $10,000 or both. The current maximum penalty is a single year in prison or a $1,000 fine or both.

The maximum penalty be doubled to 20 years in prison or a $20,000 fine or both if anyone is injured as the ultimate result of such transport of explosives.

Penalties for bomb threats be raised from 1 year in prison to a maximum of 5 years or $5,000 fine or both.

Incendiary devices be included in the category of "explosives," bringing such devices under the antibombing provisions.

Use of explosives to damage or destroy any building, vehicle, or other property owned or leased to the Federal Government be made a Federal crime.

Possession, without written authorization, of any explosive in such a building be made a Federal crime.

Use of explosives to damage or destroy any building or property used for business purposes by any person or firm engaged in interstate commerce, or in any activity affecting such commerce, be made a Federal crime.

Possession of explosives with the intent to damage either Federal property or property used in its business by a person engaged in interstate commerce also be made a Federal crime.

The individual engaged in the transport or use of explosives in violation of these provisions be made subject to the death penalty if a fatality occurs.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to come together in a nonpartisan effort to stop terrorist bombings and bring the perpetrators to justice. As President Nixon stated in his message to Congress:

The anarchic and criminal elements who perpetrate such actions deserve no more patience or indulgence. . . . They must be dealt with as the potential murderers they are.

BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. HALPERN) for 5 minutes.

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, March 25 commemorated the 52d anniversary of that brief moment in 1918 when the Byelorussian National Council declared their independence from the Russian state.

The Byelorussian American Association's national headquarters is located in my congressional district, and I join with them in the fervent hope that these people attain their long-sought independence from Russian rule. Speeches and remarks by Members of Congress have served to remind the Russian people that we here in America still recognize their plight and are mindful of their unfailing great strength and never-ending hope for freedom.

In these tremulous times, when freedom's candles flicker more and more faintly in so many parts of the world, I would like to remind my colleagues of the Byelorussian people's long struggle for their freedom and their land.

Since the beginning of the 13th century, these courageous people have strained against repeated shackles of tyranny and bondage to preserve their sense of national honor and unity. They were content with the simple and mean existence of the farmer on a vast and frigid land of 80,000 square miles which extends from the eastern borders of Poland to the western approaches of Moscow. In 1795, their land was overrun by the Moscovites.

When the czarist regime tried to obliterate all traces of nationalistic feeling among the Byelorussians, these rugged people resisted, finally seizing upon the chaotic conditions at the outbreak of World War I as a desperate opportunity to establish their own national independence. The first all-Byelorussian Congress met much like the founders of our own country met, to establish a new nation free from the burdens and bondage of a stranglehold possessor nation. They adopted a resolution endorsing the right of nations to self-determination and overwhelmingly called for the establishment of a democratic government to shape the destiny of this new nation.

But the powerful Red army, sensing a threat to their interests, forcibly disbanded the Congress and attacked the new republic. The Byelorussians fought valiantly for nearly a year, only to finally fall under the heel of the Communist state. Their land was made a part of the Soviet Union, but these peoples indomitable spirit could not be crushed.

Today the Byelorussians still tend to their farms and simple customs in the heart of Russia. But they have not lost the hope for freedom nor the love of their land, and they live with the destiny of their little nation ever foremost in their minds and hearts. The Byelorussian national headquarters here in America strives to keep this spirit alive, to sustain of hope of their people. And today, on the anniversary of this lost nation that scarcely uttered its first breaths before being crushed, I offer my fervent prayer that one day soon the words of their declaration of independence will again ring true and these people will again be free to create the coveted destiny of their nation, Byelorussia.
